14. The assignment of the public ambulance service to medical aid organisations relates only to the operation of the service. The ultimate responsibility of the delegating public authority for the service appears to remain intact, as is reflected in the fact that they retain the rights to exercise supervision and give directions and the obligation to bear the costs.

15. The referring court states that in almost all cases the competent districts and towns have assigned the public ambulance service to the recognised medical aid organisations, namely the Deutsches Rotes Kreuz (German Red Cross), the Arbeiter-Samariter Bund (Workers Samaritans' Federation), the Johanniter-Unfall-Hilfe (St. John's accident assistance) and the Malteser-Hilfsdienst (Maltese aid service). The town of Trier however - more precisely the town fire brigade - operates the public ambulance service itself.

16. The referring court states also that the operation of the service is assigned by means of a unilateral act of the competent authority (Beleihung). Paragraph 5(2) of the RettDG 1991 states however that assignment is effected by a public law contract (öffentlich rechtlicher Vertrag) between the competent authority and the medical aid organisation concerned. Two such contracts have been submitted to the Court.

17. The ambulance stations are set up, staffed and maintained by the medical aid organisation to which the public ambulance service in that geographical area has been assigned. Where the ambulance stations within a given operational area are assigned to more than one medical aid organisation, it is for the largest organisation to set up, staff and maintain the central control unit.

3. The financing of the public ambulance service

18. The public ambulance service is financed partly by the State, partly through user charges.

19. Infrastructure costs of the central control units and the ambulance stations (construction, maintenance, equipment, rents) are to a large extent financed directly by the Land or the districts and towns.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

20. Under Paragraph 12(1) of the RettDG 1991 the remaining costs - mostly operating costs (Betriebskosten) - are to be financed through user charges (Benutzungsentgelte). According to the principle of full cost coverage (Selbstkostendeckungsprinzip) the user charges must be calculated so as to cover all costs of the public ambulance service which are not financed from other sources.

21. Under Paragraph 12(2) of the RettDG 1991 the medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service and the associations representing the health insurance sector conclude agreements on the sums to be paid as user charges. Those agreements must be approved by the competent minister. The reason the associations representing the health insurance sector play such an important role in the determination of the user charges is that those charges are ultimately to be paid by public and private health insurers.

22. User charges must be fixed uniformly for the Land. They are thus identical for ambulance services provided in towns and in remote areas.

4. Authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services

23. In parallel with the rules on the public ambulance service there are general rules governing authorisations for the provision of ambulance services.

24. Those rules were initially to be found in the Law on the conveyance of persons (Personenbeförderungsgesetz) which is a federal law applicable throughout Germany. That law regarded the provision of ambulance services as a mode of conveyance of persons by hired car. Providers of ambulance services needed an authorisation to engage in that occupation. The grant of authorisation was subject to guarantees as to the safety and efficiency of the operation and to assurances as to the reliability and professional qualifications of the operator. Authorisation to operate an ambulance service - unlike a taxi service, for example - did not however depend on an assessment of need. Within that legal framework the public ambulance service, with its obligation to be available throughout the territory 24 hours every day, coexisted with private independent operators who were mainly engaged in non-emergency transport of patients during day-time.

25. In 1989 - apparently at the request of the Länder - the federal law in question was amended in such a way as to remove the sector of ambulance services from its scope. The way was thus clear for legislation of the Länder - in Rheinland-Pfalz the RettDG 1991.

26. As a consequence the RettDG 1991 contains, unlike its predecessors, not only rules on the public ambulance service but also general rules on the provision of ambulance services and in particular on the authorisations necessary to provide such services.

27. As under the previous federal regime the grant of the authorisation is subject to guarantees as to the safety and efficiency of the operation and to assurances as to the reliability and professional qualifications of the operator.

28. Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991, which is the provision at the heart of the present case, imposes however a new requirement. It is worded as follows:

Authorisation shall be refused if it would be likely to have an adverse effect on the general interest in the operation of an effective public ambulance service as defined in Paragraph 2(1). In establishing the plan of the Land for the public ambulance service... regard shall be had in particular to the reserve capacity of the public ambulance service throughout the territory and the actual use made of the public ambulance service within the operational area concerned; planning should also be based on the number of operations, on arrival times and on the duration of operations, as well as on expenditure and revenue...

29. According to the national court that rule must be interpreted as granting the medical aid organisations a de facto monopoly over the markets for emergency and patient transport services. In its view, under the rule at issue authorisations for independent operators of ambulance services could be issued only if the public ambulance service were unable to cover the needs. That however can never be the case since the public ambulance service is obliged to ensure a comprehensive public ambulance service around the clock. The necessary capacities of the public ambulance service are determined, not by economic considerations, but by possible emergency cases and even catastrophes. In the public ambulance service periods of standby duty will therefore necessarily predominate over operating periods. Authorisations for private operators will therefore never be useful or necessary. They would on the contrary reduce utilisation of the public ambulance service and thus negatively affect its expenditure and revenues.

III - The main proceedings

30. The plaintiff Firma Ambulanz Glöckner (Ambulanz Glöckner) is a private undertaking established in Pirmasens which provides ambulance services outside the public ambulance service. It appears from the file that it owns and operates two patient transport ambulances and one emergency ambulance. Under a framework agreement which it has concluded with two major health insurers it may request a reimbursable remuneration for its services which appears to be considerably lower than the user charges for the public ambulance service.

31. As regards its emergency ambulance, it was granted in 1990 - thus before entry into force of the RettDG 1991 and still under the previous federal legislation - an authorisation to provide patient transport services which was due to expire in October 1994.

32. In July 1994 it applied to the authorities of the defendant Landkreis (administrative district) Südwestpfalz (the Landkreis) for a renewal of the authorisation for the provision of emergency and patient transport services.

33. The Landkreis invited the two medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service in the area, namely the Deutsches Rotes Kreuz Landesverband Rheinland-Pfalz (the DRK) and the Arbeiter Samariter-Bund Landesverband Rheinland-Pfalz (the ASB) to express their views on the effects which the requested authorisation would have.

34. Both organisations stated that the comprehensive provision of the public ambulance service was in any event not being operated in such a way as to cover costs, so that the addition of a further operator would either require user charges to go up or the basic availability of the public ambulance service to be reduced.

35. Thereupon the Landkreis refused the renewal of the authorisation on the basis of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991. It stated that in the relevant area the public ambulance service was operating in 1993 at only 26% of its capacity.

36. Ambulanz Glöckner first lodged an unsuccessful objection against that decision and then brought proceedings before the courts.

37. By judgment of 28 January 1998 the Verwaltungsgericht (Administrative Court) Neustadt an der Weinstrasse ordered the defendant authorities to issue the applicant with the authorisation applied for. It held essentially that it was wrong to interpret Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 as precluding in all cases the possibility to grant independent operators authorisations to provide ambulance services. On the contrary it followed from the system established by the law in issue that the legislature sought to enable private operators to provide ambulance services in parallel with the public ambulance service. The legislature therefore implicitly accepted that there may, to a certain extent, be concomitant increases in costs. Since the applicant had operated ambulance services for more than seven years, it was clear that its activity had not put at risk the operational capacity or the existence of the public ambulance service.

38. The Landkreis lodged an appeal against that judgment before the referring court, which joined the medical organisations concerned, namely the ASB and the DRK, as parties to the proceedings. Under the applicable procedural rules the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses (representative of the public interest) also participates in those proceedings.

39. According to the referring court the case depends on the applicability of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991. In its view, if that provision is to be applied, the authorities had to refuse the renewal of the authorisation since the organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service have spare capacity available, and the appeal would therefore succeed. If however Paragraph 18(3) were found to be incompatible with Community law and thus not applicable, the appeal would fail.

40. In that regard the referring court considers that the medical aid organisations are undertakings with special or exclusive rights within the meaning of Article 86(1) EC. Moreover, the adoption of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 by the legislature of the Land may be regarded as a measure prohibited by Article 86(1) EC. That is because the disputed provision creates monopolies on the market for ambulance services in violation of the general objectives of the Treaty and the prohibition under Article 81(1)(c) EC of sharing markets. In its view, the disputed provision cannot be justified under Article 86(2) EC. Since the pre-existing situation was entirely satisfactory it was unnecessary to create a service monopoly.

41. Referring to a number of judgments of the Court the national court is however in doubt about two issues, namely whether the grant of an exclusive right as such may be regarded as incompatible with the Treaty and whether the disputed measure may affect trade between Member States within the meaning of Articles 81 EC et seq.

42. In the light of those considerations it referred the following question for a preliminary ruling:

Is the creation of a monopoly for the provision of ambulance services over a defined geographical area compatible with Article 86(1) EC and Article 81 EC et seq.?

43. In the meantime the referring court has ordered the authorities provisionally and pending definitive determination in the main proceedings to issue the applicant with an authorisation to provide emergency and patient transport with the ambulance in question.

44. Ambulanz Glöckner, the Landkreis Südwestpfalz, the ASB, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses, the Austrian Government and the Commission submitted written observations. They also submitted written answers to questions put by the Court. At the hearing Ambulanz Glöckner, the Landkreis Südwestpfalz, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the Commission were represented.

IV - The scope of the present preliminary ruling procedure

45. One of the difficulties in the present case is that those submitting observations tend to disagree with the referring court and amongst themselves not only on the interpretation of the relevant provisions of the EC Treaty, but also on the interpretation of the national provisions at issue, on the factual background and on the scope of the question referred. Before starting the analysis it is thus necessary to clarify a number of preliminary points.

46. First, the referring court considers that the rules in force before 1991 entrusted only emergency transport to the medical aid organisations concerned and that the RettDG 1991 extended the scope of that assignment to comprise also patient transport. On the basis of that understanding the Commission's observations for example deal extensively with the issue whether the competition rules preclude a Member State from extending the scope of an existing monopoly for emergency transport to the new field of patient transport.

47. It is however evident from the observations of the parties to the main proceedings and in particular from the text of the Law in force before 1991 that the public ambulance service already comprised both emergency transport and patient transport before 1991. The pre-existing Law excluded from its scope (as does the RettDG 1991) only the conveyance of patients not in need of qualified help or supervision, in vehicles other than ambulances (Krankenfahrten).

48. Since that misunderstanding is manifest and concerns the pre-existing legal situation, which is not directly in issue in the present case, the Court should in my view proceed on the basis that the public ambulance service always comprised both emergency and patient transport. Where an issue manifestly does not arise, it would be unwise for the Court to try to resolve it.

49. Secondly, several of those submitting observations appear to assume that the present case also raises the question whether a provision such as Paragraph 5 of the RettDG 1991 under which the public ambulance service is to be assigned primarily to the recognised medical aid organisations is compatible with the competition rules.

50. It follows however from the facts giving rise to the main proceedings and from the order for reference that the provisions on the assignment of the public ambulance service as such are not at issue. Ambulanz Glöckner did not request to be entrusted with the public ambulance service in a given area. It asked only for an authorisation to provide independent ambulance services in parallel with and outside the public ambulance service. Nor does the referring court appear to be concerned with the fact that the public ambulance service is in principle reserved to a closed group of organisations. It merely considers that the provisions governing authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services and in particular Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 might be incompatible with Community law.

51. Thirdly - and this is perhaps the most difficult point - the referring court considers that Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 must be interpreted as precluding in all cases the grant of authorisations to independent providers of ambulance services. That seems to be the reason why it refers in its question to the creation of a monopoly. A similar point is made by the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses who contends that the disputed provision must be applied strictly in order to preclude any adverse effects on the public ambulance service.

52. The defendant Landkreis and the ASB maintain by contrast that Paragraph 18(3) must be interpreted as precluding the grant of authorisations to independent providers only where it is likely to have considerable adverse effects on the public ambulance service. They rely on the judgment at first instance of the Verwaltungsgericht Neustadt an der Weinstrasse and a passage in the travaux préparatoires of the Law. The ASB therefore suggests reformulating the question referred accordingly.

53. It is true that the interpretation of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 suggested by the referring court is not easy to reconcile with the fact that the RettDG 1991 introduced in its Paragraphs 14 to 27 a comprehensive set of provisions governing not only the conditions for the grant of authorisations for the provision of ambulance services, but also the obligations of authorised operators and the remuneration for independent ambulance services. Many of those rules would appear to be without practical relevance if the referring court's interpretation of Paragraph 18(3) were to prevail.

54. None the less, since the correct interpretation of the national law is not a matter for this Court, I would not reformulate the question referred in the way that has been suggested. In any event, the disagreement about that interpretation may be resolved in the light of the ruling to be given by this Court.

V - The arguments of the parties in outline

55. Ambulanz Glöckner maintains that the disputed provision is incompatible with Article 86(1) EC read in conjunction with Articles 81 EC et seq. and 249 EC (by virtue of a breach of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts).

56. In its view, the public authorities responsible for the public ambulance services and the medical aid organisations entrusted with those services must both be regarded as undertakings with special or exclusive rights within the meaning of Article 86(1).

57. Furthermore, the provisions of the RettDG 1991 infringe Article 86(1) EC read in conjunction with other Community law provisions for the following reasons:

- they lead to infringements of Article 81(1)(c) EC, since they enable the medical aid organisations to share out the national market for ambulance services through agreements between themselves and with the public authorities;

- they lead to infringements of Article 82 EC in that, first, the medical aid organisations are unable to satisfy consumer demand for qualified ambulance services at acceptable prices, and secondly, the public authorities and the medical aid organisations are enabled jointly to limit the access of competing operators to the market;

- Article 249 EC is infringed since the public authorities did not respect the Directive on procedures for the award of public service contracts when entrusting the medical aid organisations with the public ambulance service.

58. The Commission adopts in essence a similar line of reasoning. In its view however the Court is not sufficiently informed to decide whether the medical aid organisations' position on the market for ambulance services concerns a substantial part of the common market and whether the disputed measure might lead to behaviour which may affect trade between Member States within the meaning of Article 82 EC. With regard to those points the Commission suggests leaving the necessary assessments to the referring court and giving merely general guidance.

59. The defendant Landkreis, the ASB, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the Austrian Government all consider that the disputed measure is compatible with Community law.

60. In the first place, Article 86(1) EC is, in their view, not applicable because the medical aid organisations concerned cannot be regarded as undertakings with special or exclusive rights. Article 81(1)(c) EC and the Directive on procedures for the award of public service contracts are also not applicable.

61. Furthermore, Article 86(1) EC in conjunction with Article 82 EC is not infringed because

- the operational area of each medical aid organisation does not correspond to a substantial part of the common market,

- trade between Member States is not affected to an appreciable extent,

- the mere creation of a dominant position is not caught by those rules,

- the medical aid organisations have always provided satisfactory services and the requested user charges were justified.

62. Finally and in any event the measure at issue is justified under Article 86(2) EC. The medical aid organisations operating the public ambulance service are entrusted with the operation of services of general interest. To repeal Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG would obstruct the performance, in law and in fact, of the particular tasks assigned to them. That is inter alia because it is necessary to give the public ambulance service some measure of protection against cherry-picking by independent operators who wish to provide their services only at profitable peak hours in densely populated and therefore easily accessible areas.

63. In the light of those arguments I will discuss successively

- the applicability of Article 86(1),

- the alleged infringement of Article 86(1) read in conjunction with other Treaty provisions, and

- the possible justification under Article 86(2).

VI - Applicability of Article 86(1): undertakings with special or exclusive rights

64. Article 86(1) applies to undertakings to which Member States grant special or exclusive rights.

1. The concept of undertaking

65. Ambulanz Glöckner maintains that both the medical aid organisations and the public authorities primarily responsible for the public ambulance service must be regarded as undertakings.

(a) Medical aid organisations as undertakings

66. As regards, first, the medical aid organisations in issue, none of the parties has argued that they should not be regarded as undertakings for the purposes of competition law. We are informed that

- in the Land concerned there are four recognised medical organisations, of which the DRK (German Red Cross) is apparently the most important one,

- they are organised as non-profit-making associations,

- they are engaged inter alia in the provision of both emergency transport and patient transport services,

- in the Land concerned they have been entrusted with the operation of the public ambulance service in almost all operational areas,

- within those operational areas they set up, staff and maintain the central control units and ambulance stations,

- the infrastructure costs of the public ambulance service are financed mainly through direct public funding and the operating costs mainly through user charges,

- under the principle of full cost coverage the user charges must be calculated so as to guarantee that they cover all the costs of the public ambulance service which are not financed through other sources of funding.

67. It will be recalled that for the purposes of Community competition law the concept of undertaking encompasses every entity engaged in an economic activity regardless of the legal status of the entity and the way it is financed. The basic test is whether the entity in question is engaged in an activity which consists in offering goods and services on a given market and which could, at least in principle, be carried out by a private actor in order to make profits.

68. In the present case, it is clear from the facts of the main proceedings that non-emergency patient transport has in the past been carried out in Germany by private undertakings with a view to making profits. Moreover, it appears from the file that Ambulanz Glöckner has in the past also provided emergency transport services. Nothing therefore suggests that the nature of either emergency or patient transport is such that those services must necessarily be carried out by public entities. Whether emergency or patient transport generates profits will depend exclusively on the remuneration which the operator obtains for his services. Furthermore, the referring court states that under German civil law, too, the relationship between ambulance service provider and patient is viewed as an ordinary service contract. The provision of ambulance services therefore constitutes an economic activity within the meaning of the Court's case-law.

69. That conclusion is not affected by the legal status of the medical aid organisations as non-profit-making associations, the method of financing of their activities, or the fact that they have been entrusted with tasks in the public interest. In connection with the last two points it must be borne in mind that public service obligations may render the services provided by a given operator less competitive than comparable services rendered by other operators and thus justify under certain conditions the grant of special or exclusive rights or of State aid. It follows however from Articles 86(1) and (2) and 87 EC that public service obligations, special or exclusive rights, or State financing cannot prevent an operator's activities from being regarded as economic activities.

70. I conclude therefore that in respect of the provision of ambulance services the medical organisations in issue must be viewed as undertakings within the meaning of Article 86(1).

(b) Public authorities as undertakings

71. Ambulanz Glöckner argues, secondly, that the public authorities at issue and in particular the defendant Landkreis must also be regarded as undertakings. It recalls that the RettDG 1991 entrusts the task of operating the public ambulance service primarily to the authorities. Those authorities must therefore be regarded as potential competitors of independent operators such as Ambulanz Glöckner.

72. I consider that a differentiated approach is necessary. It is settled case-law that public bodies engaging in economic activities may be regarded as undertakings. On the other hand, activities in the exercise of official authority are sheltered from the application of the competition rules. Furthermore, the notion of undertaking is a relative concept in the sense that a given entity might be regarded as an undertaking for one part of its activities while the rest fall outside the competition rules.

73. Within the regime established by the RettDG 1991 the public authorities perform three different functions: first, they are the entities primarily responsible for the public ambulance service and on that basis they operate that service themselves in some areas; secondly, in most areas they assign the public ambulance service to medical aid organisations; and finally, they decide on authorisations for independent operators.

74. Where the public authorities operate the public ambulance service themselves (as appears to be the case in the town of Trier) they are engaged in the economic activity provision of ambulance services. In those areas the authorities in question must be viewed as undertakings within the meaning of the competition rules.

75. Where the authorities assign the public ambulance service to the medical aid organisations, it is more difficult to classify the nature of that assignment. It might be argued that the transfer of responsibility for a given economic activity from one (public) entity to another (private) entity must itself also be considered as an economic activity. Conversely it might be argued that in such a situation an authority acts in its capacity as public authority and therefore not as an undertaking within the meaning of Articles 81 EC et seq. Since the present preliminary ruling procedure does not directly concern the assignment of the public ambulance service to the medical aid organisations it is not necessary for me to express a definitive view on that difficult question.

76. As regards the activity at issue in the main proceedings, namely the grant or refusal of authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services, it will be recalled that an entity acts in the exercise of official authority where the activity in question is connected by its nature, its aim and the rules to which it is subject with the exercise of powers... which are typically those of a public authority. A decision to grant or to refuse an authorisation for the provision of ambulance services within the framework of the RettDG 1991 falls in my view clearly within that definition. Before granting the authorisation the authorities examine the safety and efficiency of the operation, the reliability and professional qualifications of the operator and - under the disputed provision - the possible effects of an authorisation on the public ambulance service. The grant or refusal of an authorisation is thus a typical administrative decision taken in the exercise of prerogatives conferred by law which are usually reserved for public authorities. I cannot see how that decision-making activity could be assimilated to the offering of goods or services on given markets.

77. The fact invoked by Ambulanz Glöckner that the public authorities are potential competitors on the market for ambulance services is in my view irrelevant for the classification of their decision-making activities.

78. First, I do not think that Article 81 EC et seq. apply to potential undertakings. Public authorities could theoretically engage in almost any economic activity and would thus permanently fall within the scope of the competition rules.

79. In any event, even where the authorities are actual competitors of independent providers (as appears to be the case in Trier), the operation of the ambulance service (economic activity) and the grant or refusal of authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services (decision-making activity) must be analysed separately. Only with regard to the former activity do the authorities act as undertakings within the meaning of the competition rules.

80. It is true that the Court's case-law requires that a State body with regulatory powers over a given market should be independent from any undertaking operating on that market. That case-law does not however establish that the authorities' regulatory activities must be viewed as economic activities, but concerns only the compatibility with the Treaty of the resulting conflict of interest.

81. I conclude therefore that the authorities cannot be viewed as undertakings where they grant or refuse authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services.

2. Special or exclusive rights

82. Ambulanz Glöckner and the Commission consider that the medical aid organisations must be viewed as undertakings to which special or exclusive rights have been granted. They refer on the one hand to the assignment of the public ambulance service under Paragraph 5 of the RettDG 1991 and on the other to the special protection afforded by Paragraph 18(3) thereof. The Landkreis and the ASB maintain that the medical aid organisations have never enjoyed special or exclusive rights, but have always been subject to competition from independent operators.

(a) The concept of special or exclusive rights

83. The concept of special or exclusive rights and in particular the concept of special rights is not easy to define.

84. In the area of telecommunications the Court partially annulled in 1991 and 1992 two Commission Directives which required the Member States to withdraw special or exclusive rights conferred on incumbent operators. As regards special rights, the Court held that the Commission failed to specify the types of rights which are actually involved and in what respect the existence of such rights is contrary to the various provisions of the Treaty.

85. The Commission reacted and provided in a Directive of 1994 the following definition of special rights:

> "special rights" means the rights that are granted by a Member State to a limited number of undertakings... which, within a given geographical area,

- limits to two or more the number of such undertakings authorised to provide a service or undertake

an activity, otherwise than according to objective, proportional and non-discriminatory criteria, or

- designates, otherwise than according to such criteria, several competing undertakings as being authorised to provide a service or undertake an activity, or

- confers on any undertaking or undertakings, otherwise than according to such criteria, legal or regulatory advantages which substantially affect the ability of any other undertaking to provide the same telecommunications service or to undertake the same activity in the same geographical area under substantially equivalent conditions.

86. In 1996 the Court adopted, for the purposes of the interpretation of several other Directives in the telecommunications sector, a definition which covers both special and exclusive rights and which is clearly inspired by the Commission's definition:

... the exclusive or special rights in question must generally be taken to be rights which are granted by the authorities of a Member State to an undertaking or a limited number of undertakings otherwise than according to objective, proportional and non-discriminatory criteria, and which substantially affect the ability of other undertakings to provide or operate telecommunications networks or to provide telecommunications services in the same geographical area under substantially equivalent conditions.

87. The four essential elements of that definition are that the rights in question must

- be granted by the authorities of a Member State,

- be granted to one undertaking or to a limited number of undertakings,

- substantially affect the ability of other undertakings to exercise the economic activity in question in the same geographical area under substantially equivalent conditions, and

- be granted otherwise than according to objective, proportional and non-discriminatory criteria.

88. I consider that the first three elements of that definition can also be used to define the concept of special or exclusive rights in Article 86(1) EC, whilst the fourth element should not be transposed to that different context. That fourth element - namely that the rights in question must be granted otherwise than according to objective, proportional and non-discriminatory criteria - is designed to apply the liberalisation process in the telecommunications sector to only those rights the grant of which is not justified. It is therefore designed to distinguish between legitimate and illegitimate special or exclusive rights. In Article 86(1) EC, however, the concept of special or exclusive rights serves only the purpose of determining the scope of application of that provision. The separate and further question whether those rights are legitimate is to be determined according to the Treaty provisions to which Article 86(1) EC refers and according to Article 86(2) EC.

89. Special or exclusive rights within the meaning of Article 86(1) EC are thus in my view rights granted by the authorities of a Member State to one undertaking or to a limited number of undertakings which substantially affect the ability of other undertakings to exercise the economic activity in question in the same geographical area under substantially equivalent conditions.

(b) Medical aid organisations as undertakings with special or exclusive rights

90. In the light of the arguments of the parties three distinct State measures - two of a regulatory and one of a decisional nature - might potentially be viewed as the grant of special or exclusive rights, namely

- Paragraph 5 of the RettDG 1991 under which the public ambulance service must be assigned with priority to the recognised medical aid organisations,

- the actual assignment to a medical aid organisation of the public ambulance service for a given geographical area, and

- the introduction of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 which, according to the referring court's interpretation, precludes authorisations for independent operators.

91. As regards, first, Paragraph 5 of the RettDG 1991 it must be recalled that Ambulanz Glöckner did not request to be entrusted with the public ambulance service and that neither the other parties nor the referring court criticised that provision. I do not therefore need to take a view on whether the special treatment of a closed group of organisations must be viewed as the grant of special or exclusive rights.

92. I consider, secondly, that the actual assignment of the public ambulance to a given medical aid organisation as such does not grant special or exclusive rights to that organisation since it does not in itself affect the ability of competing operators to offer ambulance services in the area in question. In that regard it must be borne in mind that before 1991 the assignment of the public ambulance service to certain recognised medical aid organisations had no influence whatsoever on the possibility for independent operators to apply for an authorisation to provide ambulance services.

93. That leads me, thirdly, to Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991. Before entry into force of that rule independent operators could obtain the necessary authorisations for the provision of ambulance services relatively easily. The grant of those authorisations was subject only to guarantees as to the safety and efficiency of the operation and the reliability and professional qualifications of the operator. Under the new Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 authorisation must be refused where its use is likely to have adverse effects on the operation and profitability of the public ambulance service.

94. It is thus Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG which grants special or exclusive rights to the medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service. Only Paragraph 18(3) and its application by the authorities affect the ability of other undertakings to exercise the economic activity in question in the same geographical area as the medical aid organisations.

95. I therefore conclude that the introduction of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 granted the medical aid organisations concerned special or exclusive rights within the meaning of Article 86(1) EC. They must consequently be viewed as undertakings falling within the scope of that provision.

VII - Infringement of Article 86(1) EC read in conjunction with other provisions of the Treaty

96. In the case of undertakings with special or exclusive rights Article 86(1) EC prohibits Member States from enacting or maintaining in force any measure contrary to the rules contained in [the] Treaty, in particular to those rules provided for in... Articles 81 to 89. Article 86(1) cannot therefore be applied in isolation, but must always be used in combination with another provision of the EC Treaty.

97. Ambulanz Glöckner maintains that the disputed provision infringes Article 86(1) EC read in conjunction with three different provisions, namely Articles 249(3), 81(1)(c), and 82 EC.

1. Articles 86(1) and 249(3) EC

98. Ambulanz Glöckner claims that the rule assigning the public ambulance service with priority to the recognised medical aid organisations is incompatible with Directive 92/50/EEC on the procedures for the award of public service contracts.

99. I have however already established that the question of the assignment of the public ambulance service lies outside the scope of the present preliminary ruling procedure. In the main proceedings

Ambulanz Glöckner does not challenge the fact that the medical aid organisations were entrusted with the public ambulance service, but only that it did not obtain an authorisation to provide independent ambulance services outside the public ambulance service. The procedure for obtaining such an administrative authorisation is very different from the award of a public service contract and is therefore not covered by the rules on public procurement.

2. Articles 86(1) and 81(1)(c) EC

100. The referring court and Ambulanz Glöckner consider that the conduct of the authorities and the DRK and ASB when refusing the authorisation constituted prohibited market sharing. They also claim that the regime established by the RettDG 1991 leads inevitably to agreements between the authorities and medical aid organisations which are prohibited by Article 81(1)(c).

101. In my view Article 81 EC does not apply since the RettDG 1991 does not lead to agreements between undertakings within the meaning of that provision.

102. That is, in the first place, because the authorities act in the exercise of public authority when they grant or refuse authorisations. In that respect they are therefore not engaged in an economic activity and cannot be regarded as undertakings for the purposes of Article 81 EC.

103. In any event, there do not appear to be agreements or concerted practices between the authorities and the medical aid organisations. The medical aid organisations simply suggest a decision which is then taken unilaterally by the authorities. The authorities have sole power and responsibility for that decision and do not appear to be bound by the observations of the medical aid organisations.

3. Articles 86(1) and 82 EC

104. Article 86(1) EC prohibits Member States from adopting measures which are contrary to Article 82. The latter provision is however addressed only to undertakings, not to Member States. The two rules read in combination must thus be understood as prohibiting State measures which would deprive the prohibition in Article 82 EC of its effectiveness.

105. The problem to be analysed is therefore not whether concrete abuses of a dominant position have been committed (for which the undertaking concerned might be responsible under Article 82 EC read in isolation), but whether the Member State in question has adopted or maintained in force measures which are liable to create a situation in which the the undertakings concerned are led to commit such abuses.

106. In the light of the wording of both Article 86(1) and 82 EC I will therefore examine, first, whether the medical aid organisations in issue are in a dominant position within a substantial part of the common market; secondly, whether a provision such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 is a State measure which is liable to create a situation in which the undertakings concerned are led to commit an abuse of that dominant position; and finally, whether the measure or the abusive behaviour may affect trade between Member States.

(a) Dominant position of one or more undertakings within a substantial part of the common market

- The relevant product market

107. The Commission argues that there are two different product markets, namely the market for emergency transport and the market for patient transport.

108. The Landkreis and the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses contend by contrast that there is one global market for ambulance services. They contend that an emergency ambulance may in practice often be used for non-emergency patient transport. Ambulanz Glöckner's emergency ambulance at issue in the main proceedings was for example also used for non-emergency patient transport. Conversely there are situations (e.g. major accidents, catastrophes) where patient transport ambulances can be used to provide emergency transport services. Moreover, a certain percentage (the Landkreis advances a figure of 8 to 10%) of non-emergency transports change their nature in the course of the transportation and become emergency transports.

109. I am not fully convinced by those arguments. Relevant product market may be defined as follows:

A relevant product market comprises all those products and/or services which are regarded as interchangeable or substitutable by the consumer, by reason of the products' characteristics, their prices and their intended use.

110. In the light of that definition I think that the Commission is right to regard the markets for emergency transport and non-emergency transport as distinct markets. First, patients do not normally regard non-emergency transport services as a valid substitute for emergency transport (except perhaps as a last resort in case of catastrophes or major accidents). Emergency transport will conversely not be regarded as a valid substitute for non-emergency transport because emergency transport is considerably more expensive. Furthermore, patients expect emergency transport to be provided as rapidly as possible, 24 hours a day and by highly qualified personnel. Non-emergency transport e.g. from hospital to hospital may be provided at more convenient hours during the week when the vehicle in question is free. Legal requirements as regards the medical equipment of the respective vehicles and the qualification of the aid personnel are also different. Because of its special nature, efficient planning of emergency transport is considerably more difficult than the planning of non-emergency transport. As a consequence of those fundamental differences the costs of emergency transport services are much higher.

111. There are thus, in my view, two relevant product markets, namely the market for emergency transport and the market for non-emergency patient transport.

- The relevant geographical market

112. The Commission contends that the relevant geographical market is the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz.

113. Relevant geographical market may be defined as follows:

The relevant geographic market comprises the area in which the undertakings concerned are involved in the supply and demand of products or services, in which the conditions of competition are sufficiently homogeneous and which can be distinguished from neighbouring areas because the conditions of competition are appreciably different in those areas.

114. It might be argued that the relevant geographical market for the provision of ambulance services is confined to one operational area (Rettungsdienstbereich) and thus in the main proceedings the Rettungsdienstbereich Pirmasens. It is at that level that the decisions on authorisations are taken, that medical aid organisations are heard and that the effects on the public ambulance service are assessed.

115. I tend however to agree with the Commission and consider that the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz must be seen as the relevant market. The legislative framework for the provision of independent ambulance services and the organisational structures of the public ambulance service are identical throughout the Land. The user charges for the public ambulance service are fixed uniformly at the level of the Land. Ambulanz Glöckner could therefore exercise its activities and apply for authorisations for its ambulances in other geographical areas of the Land under exactly the same conditions.

116. Ambulanz Glöckner states that the laws of the different Länder governing the provision of ambulance services are very similar and that Germany must therefore be seen as a homogeneous area with almost identical market conditions. The Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses contests that statement and claims that there are considerable differences between the laws of the various Länder.

117. It will be for the national court to decide whether the conditions of competition in the two markets for emergency transport and non-emergency patient transport are sufficiently homogeneous throughout Germany to consider the entire territory of that Member State as the relevant geographical market.

118. For the purposes of the present Opinion I will assume that Rheinland-Pfalz is the relevant geographical market.

- Dominant position on the relevant market

119. It follows from the referring court's interpretation of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 that a medical aid organisation entrusted with the public ambulance service for a given ambulance station enjoys a legally protected monopoly in the geographical area covered by that station.

120. In the operational area of Pirmasens the DRK has been assigned six ambulance stations and the operation of the central control unit, whilst the ASB operates only one ambulance station. Ambulanz Glöckner is the only independent provider of ambulance services. The DRK thus appears to be in a dominant position in that operational area.

121. As regards the relevant geographical market, namely the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz, it appears from the file that the DRK is the medical aid organisation which is entrusted with the public ambulance service in by far the greater part of the Land. The other three medical aid organisations seem to operate on a much smaller scale and there are apparently only two independent providers. It thus seems that the DRK holds in the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz a dominant position on the markets both for emergency transport and for non-emergency transport.

122. In the final analysis the question of dominance will also have to be resolved by the referring court. If that court were to find that the DRK alone is not in a dominant position it would have to examine the hypothesis of a collective dominant position held by the recognised medical aid organisations.

123. For the purposes of the Opinion I will assume that the DRK holds a dominant position in Rheinland-Pfalz.

- The relevant market as a substantial part of the common market

124. Ambulanz Glöckner claims that the relevant geographical market, namely Rheinland-Pfalz, constitutes a substantial part of the common market within the meaning of Article 82 EC. It relies, first, on Merci Convenzionali Porto di Genova, where the Court held that the Port of Genoa constituted a substantial part of the common market and, secondly, on Centre d'insémination de la Crespelle, where the Court held that by establishing a contiguous series of monopolies territorially limited but together covering the entire territory of a Member State, the national provisions in question created a dominant position in a substantial part of the common market.

125. The Landkreis and the ASB contend that there is no dominant position over a substantial part of the common market. That criterion is in their view intended to exclude from the scope of Community competition law undertakings in a dominant position on local or small regional markets since their dominance does not threaten effective competition in the common market. The medical aid organisations in issue do therefore not fall within Article 82 EC.

126. In Suiker Unie the Court established the following basic test:

For the purpose of determining whether a specific territory is large enough to amount to "a substantial part of the common market" within the meaning of Article [82 EC] the pattern and volume of the production and consumption of the said product as well as the habits and economic opportunities of vendors and purchasers must be considered.

127. That test emphasises the economic importance of a given territory. In some cases the Court has considered even geographically small areas to be a substantial part of the common market. The decisive element in those cases was the particular economic importance of the area in question. In Merci Convenzionali Porto di Genova for example the Court relied on the volume of traffic in the Port of Genoa and that port's importance in relation to maritime import and export operations as a whole in the Member State concerned. That reasoning cannot in my view be transposed to the present case. Ambulance services in Rheinland-Pfalz are neither particularly important nor particularly unimportant for the German economy.

128. I consider none the less that the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz must be regarded as a substantial part of the common market. In the absence of particular economic characteristics of a given area, geographical factors become more significant.

129. Rheinland-Pfalz covers a territory of almost 20 000 km2 and has around four million inhabitants. It is thus larger or has more inhabitants than some Member States.

130. The Court has already held that the southern part of Germany and thus an area falling short of the territory of a Member State could constitute a substantial part of the common market. A similar statement can be found in Bodson where the group of undertakings controlled by Pompes funèbres générales held an exclusive concession in less than 10% of communes in France, the population of which accounted however for more than one third of the total population. The Court ruled in that case which presents many features similar to the present one:

Article [82 EC] applies in a case in which a number of communal monopolies are granted to a single group of undertakings whose market strategy is determined by the parent company, in a situation in which those monopolies cover a certain part of the national territory... (emphasis added).

131. Advocate General Warner indicated in another case that one who had a monopoly or near monopoly of the Luxembourg market for a particular product should also be subject to Article 82 EC.

132. Furthermore, I consider that the reasoning of la Crespelle is of some assistance.

133. It is true that in la Crespelle the regional monopolies covered the entire territory of a Member State whilst in the present case the legal regime in issue covers only the territory of the Land of Rheinland-Pfalz (even if Ambulanz Glöckner claims that the situation is essentially the same throughout Germany). It is also true that in la Crespelle the monopolies were clearly conferred by national legislation. In the present case Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 protects the undertakings entrusted with the public ambulance service only indirectly.

134. There is however another difference between the two cases which pleads in favour of applying Article 82 in the present case. It appears that in la Crespelle the regional monopolies in issue were held by different economic actors. On a national scale each of those actors was consequently relatively small. In the present case the DRK appears to be entrusted in most areas of Rheinland-Pfalz with the public ambulance service. If we accept the referring court's interpretation of Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG there is thus a series of contiguous monopolies which are mostly held by one medical aid organisation. Contrary to what was stated by the Landkreis and the ASB, the medical aid organisation in issue therefore does not appear to be a minor actor active only on a local or small regional scale.

135. The above survey of the case-law suggests that there is no single formula for establishing whether a dominant position exists in a substantial part of the common market. It also shows why there is no such single formula: the range of possible cases is too diverse, and each case must therefore be analysed on its own facts. However, the survey also leads to the conclusion that, if the dominant position in the present case extends to the whole of the Rheinland-Pfalz (and of course a fortiori if it should be found that the situation is replicated across the whole of Germany), then the dominant position exists in a substantial part of the common market.

136. Accordingly, I will assume the following: the relevant markets are the markets for emergency and for patient transport in Rheinland-Pfalz. The DRK is dominant on both product markets. That dominant position exists in a substantial part of the common market.

(b) Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 and potential abuses of a dominant position

137. Ambulanz Glöckner argues essentially that the provision at issue is contrary to Article 86(1) EC in that it leads to two types of infringements of Article 82 EC. In its view, the disputed provision favours a situation in which the medical aid organisations are unable to satisfy consumer demand for qualified ambulance services at acceptable prices and empowers the public authorities and the medical aid organisations jointly to limit access of competing operators to the market.

138. The other side argues essentially that the mere creation of a dominant position is not caught by Articles 86(1) and 82 EC and that the medical aid organisations have always provided satisfactory services at acceptable prices.

139. The Court has held that the mere creation of a dominant position by the granting of exclusive rights within the meaning of Article 86(1) EC is not as such contrary to the Treaty. But it has also held that even though Article 86(1) presupposes the existence of undertakings which have certain special or exclusive rights, it does not follow that all the special or exclusive rights are necessarily compatible with the Treaty; that depends on different rules, to which Article 86(1) refers.

140. Recently the Court has restated its position on that issue as follows:

[T]he mere creation of a dominant position through the grant of exclusive rights within the meaning of Article [86(1) EC] is not in itself incompatible with Article [82 EC]. A Member State will be in breach of the prohibitions laid down by those two provisions only if the undertaking in question, merely by exercising the exclusive rights granted to it, is led to abuse its dominant position or where such rights are liable to create a situation in which that undertaking is led to commit such abuses...

141. I will examine, first, whether Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 creates a situation in which the medical aid organisations are manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand and, secondly, whether it creates a conflict of interest in which the medical aid organisations are led to abuse their dominant position by limiting the access of independent operators to the market.

- Situation in which dominant undertakings are manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand

142. It follows from Höfner that a Member State's decision to grant special or exclusive rights is contrary to the Treaty where the undertaking concerned is manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand and therefore cannot avoid abusing its dominant position by constantly limiting production, markets or technical development to the prejudice of consumers (Article 82(b) EC).

143. The parties strongly disagree on whether that is the case in the present proceedings.

144. Ambulanz Glöckner contends in substance that

- as regards emergency transport, the medical aid organisations were not always able to respect the arrival times prescribed by the RettDG;

- as regards non-emergency patient transport, delays of between one hour and two and a half hours occur which means for example that technical installations in hospitals waiting for patients are used inefficiently;

- the medical aid organisations charge for their services disproportionately high user charges which are the result of mismanagement, the absence of competitive pressure and the guarantee that ultimately all losses will be covered by the State; that is confirmed by the fact that services of independent and thus profit-oriented operators are much less expensive;

- since the introduction of rules such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 the costs of the public ambulance service in Germany have risen disproportionately; the costs of patient transport in Germany rose from DEM 1.76 billion in 1991 to DEM 3.14 billion in 1997 (increase of 78.41%) and the costs in Rheinland-Pfalz rose from DEM 86 million in 1992 to DEM 128 million in 1999 (increase of 49.75%).

145. The Landkreis, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the ASB contend by contrast that

- as regards emergency transport, the medical aid organisations have respected the prescribed arrival times in more than 90% of the cases; isolated cases of delay will always happen and do not as such prove a system failure;

- as regards delays in the field of non-emergency transport, Ambulanz Glöckner has not presented any evidence for its contention;

- the higher user charges of the public ambulance services can be explained by the costs of providing services 24 hours a day and throughout the territory of the Land; if for social reasons user charges are uniform throughout the Land then they will necessarily be higher than the remuneration requested by private undertakings which provide their lucrative services only in densely populated areas during peak times;

- the increase in the costs of patient transport in Germany and in Rheinland-Pfalz is mainly the result of structural improvements in the public ambulance service over the last 10 years: in Rheinland-Pfalz nine additional ambulance stations have been created, the requirements as regards the qualifications of ambulance personnel have been raised and a system of emergency doctors has been set up. Moreover the statistics provided by Ambulanz Glöckner include the costs of conveyance of patients not in need of help in vehicles other than ambulances, which contributed disproportionately to the increase in question.

146. In my view the Court is not in a position to decide who is right on that issue. To decide whether the DRK or other medical aid organisations are unable to satisfy demand requires difficult economic and factual assessments. In a preliminary reference procedure those assessments are for the referring court.

147. In making those assessments the national courts should in my view take into account the following factors.

148. First, the national courts must bear in mind the respective responsibilities of the national legislature and of the medical aid organisations within Articles 86(1) and 82 EC. A Member State is liable under Article 86(1) only where there is a failure in the system which it has set up, that is to say where an abuse is the consequence of its regulatory or decisional intervention, whereas undertakings enjoying special or exclusive rights are alone responsible for any infringement of the competition rules attributable exclusively to them. Articles 86(1) and 82 will therefore not be infringed where the only reason that a medical aid organisation is manifestly not able to satisfy demand is inefficient management.

149. Secondly, because the granting of special or exclusive rights involves difficult economic assessments and social choices, the Member States must enjoy a certain discretion in deciding whether a monopolist will or will not be able to satisfy demand. The Court has therefore limited its review, and that of the referring court, to national provisions which are manifestly inappropriate.

150. Thirdly, rapid and high quality ambulance services are - as the representative of the Landkreis rightly explained - a question of life and death and therefore of paramount importance for society as a whole.

151. The referring court should therefore analyse primarily whether authorisations for independent operators may contribute to shorter arrival times and to generally higher quality services, or whether on the contrary even without such authorisations the public ambulance service is perfectly able to provide the necessary services in all situations and at all times of the day. The decisive factor should in my view be the ability of the public ambulance service to provide rapid and high quality services even at peak hours. If the capacities of the public ambulance service are insufficient at those times (e.g. regular delays of non-emergency transport in towns), I would find it unacceptable systematically to refuse authorisations to independent operators.

152. I consider that the referring court may however attach less importance to the allegedly excessive prices of the public ambulance services. To assess whether prices are excessive is always a difficult exercise and such a finding has rarely, if ever, been made by the Court or the Commission under the competition rules. Price comparisons are also difficult because the public ambulance service with its special obligations has a different cost structure from private undertakings focusing on particularly profitable geographical areas.

153. I conclude therefore that it is for the national court to establish whether Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 creates a situation in which the medical aid organisations are manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand. That court should attach particular importance to the capacity of the medical aid organisations to provide rapid and high quality services at peak hours.

- Creation of a conflict of interest

154. Ambulanz Glöckner refers to the judgment in Raso and contends that Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 creates a conflict of interest in that the medical aid organisations and the public authorities are together enabled to limit the access of their potential competitors to the market. In its view the medical aid organisations and the authorities should not be allowed to take part in the decision-making as regards authorisations for the provision of independent ambulance services.

155. It is settled case-law that Articles 86(1) and 82 EC may be infringed where a State measure creates a conflict of interests between two commercial activities of an undertaking with special or exclusive rights or between a regulatory mission entrusted to such an undertaking and its economic interests.

156. In the present case Ambulanz Glöckner appears to complain more about the second type of conflict of interests, namely a conflict between regulatory powers and economic interests.

157. In that regard it will be recalled that the defendant Landkreis consulted the medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service in the operational area of Pirmasens before taking its decision to refuse the authorisation. We also know that both medical aid organisations had recommended that refusal.

158. That way of proceeding is in my view not prohibited by Articles 86(1) and 82 EC.

159. In the first place, as I have already stated, the national authorities do not act as undertakings when they grant or refuse authorisations. They act only in the exercise of public authority without an economic interest in the outcome of the procedure. They thus fall outside the scope of Articles 86(1) and 82 EC.

160. As regards the medical aid organisations, it is true that they fall within the scope of those Articles and that they have an economic interest in the outcome of the authorisation procedure. But they have a right only to be consulted in the course of the authorisation procedure and the final decision is taken by the public authorities alone. It has not been suggested that the Landkreis is bound by the factual statements or the recommendations of the medical aid organisations. The medical aid organisations are thus not entrusted with regulatory powers within the meaning of the Court's case-law.

161. Moreover, it appears from the RettDG 1991 that the Landkreis enjoys no discretion as regards its decision, but must grant the authorisation, if the ambulance operator concerned fulfils the legal requirements. The main proceedings show that a refusal is then subject to full judicial review. Those are two important further safeguards against biased decisions.

162. I conclude therefore that the mere consultation of the medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service in the course of the procedure for authorisation of independent ambulance services is not contrary to Articles 86(1) and 82 EC.

(c) Effect on trade between Member States

163. The Landkreis, the ASB, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the Austrian Government all maintain that the measure in question does not have appreciable effects on trade between Member States and that therefore the Community competition rules do not apply. In their view, all the elements of the present case are confined not only within a single Member State, but within a territory which is only a part of a Member State. Emergency transport is by definition a locally confined activity, since the patient must be transported as rapidly as possible to the nearest suitable hospital. Cross-border ambulance services take place rarely and are not affected by the provision in issue.

164. Under the Treaty, for Articles 86(1) and 82 EC to apply either the effects of the abuse or the effects of the State measure must be liable to affect trade between Member States.

165. The Court has held in that regard:

The interpretation and application of the conditions relating to effects on trade between Member States contained in Articles [81] and [82 EC] must be based on the purpose of that condition which is to define, in the context of the law governing competition, the boundary between the areas respectively covered by Community law and the law of the Member States. Thus Community law covers any agreement or any practice which is capable of constituting a threat to freedom of trade between Member States in a manner which might harm the attainment of the objectives of a single market between the Member States, in particular by partitioning the national markets or by affecting the structure of competition within the common market...

166. The Court has also explained that it is not necessary to prove an actual effect; a potential effect is sufficient. On the other hand the effect in issue must be appreciable and not just insignificant.

167. It follows also from the case-law that an undertaking may invoke Articles 86 and 82(1) EC against its own State in proceedings which do not involve a concrete cross-border element in its own situation. Perhaps the best example in that respect is Höfner in which the Court did not apply the rules on freedom to provide services because the activities at issue in the main proceedings were confined in all respects to one Member State. It did however apply the competition rules since the national provisions at issue potentially affected recruitment of nationals of other Member States.

168. The Commission - which maintains a neutral position on this issue - states in support of the applicability of Community competition law that the proximity of Rheinland-Pfalz to Belgium, France and Luxembourg makes cross-border transports more likely. It also mentions three situations in which patient transport might be provided over longer distances and across State borders, namely where a patient wishes to be transported for a particular operation to a specialised hospital situated in another Member State, where a migrant worker wishes to be treated in his home country, or in the case of holiday injuries (e.g. skiing accidents).

169. I consider that if the rules at issue were to be interpreted as prohibiting those types of cross-border service then they would indeed have to be regarded as affecting trade in services between Member States.

170. However, if I understand the provision at issue correctly, occasional cross-border transports of patients do not seem to fall within its scope. Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 seems to be mainly an obstacle for operators who wish to provide ambulance services in Rheinland-Pfalz on a more permanent basis. It is a rule which renders the access of operators from other Member States to the market in Rheinland-Pfalz more difficult.

171. Does such a rule affect trade between Member States? It might seem at first sight unlikely that ambulance operators from other Member States would ask for authorisations to operate their ambulances in Rheinland-Pfalz. Effects on trade would thus not be appreciable within the meaning of the Court's case-law.

172. Ambulanz Glöckner stated however at the hearing that one operator established in Luxembourg and two operators established in France had already tried to obtain authorisations to provide ambulance services in Rheinland-Pfalz and that those authorisations were refused on the basis of the RettDG 1991. It also stated that operators established in other Member States had lodged complaints with the Commission against the restrictive authorisation systems in place in Rheinland-Pfalz and other parts of Germany.

173. It will be for the referring court to verify whether those statements are correct. It will then also be for the referring court - taking into account the results of its verification - to determine whether in view of the economic characteristics of the two product markets for ambulance services in Rheinland-Pfalz there is a sufficient degree of likelihood that a rule such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 prevents operators established in other Member States from either operating ambulances or even establishing themselves in Rheinland-Pfalz.

VIII - Justification under Article 86(2) EC

174. The Landkreis, the ASB, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the Austrian Government argue that a rule such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991, even if there were a prima facie infringement of Articles 86(1) and 82 EC, would be in any event justified under Article 86(2) EC.

175. In my view there can be no doubt that the medical aid organisations are entrusted with the operation of a service of general economic interest within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC. Services of general economic interest have a special importance in the Community, as is now emphasised by Article 16 EC (formerly Article 7d, introduced by the Treaty of Amsterdam). There is an obvious and strong public interest that every citizen should have access to efficient and high-quality emergency transport and non-emergency patient transport services. The only issue is therefore whether a rule such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 is necessary to protect the performance, in law or in fact, of the particular tasks assigned to the medical aid organisations.

176. The Landkreis, the ASB and the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses argue, first, that the presence of independent operators on the markets for emergency and non-emergency patient transport might cause confusion for accident victims and patients, with potentially fatal consequences. In particular in emergency situations persons who wish to alert emergency ambulances must not be confronted with a confusing choice between several ambulance service providers.

177. I am not convinced by that argument. It is obviously necessary to prevent such dangerous instances of confusion. However, it seems likely that there will not be many cases of conflict because independent operators will normally prefer to provide non-emergency transport services. In any event it should be feasible to coordinate the services provided by independent providers with those of the public ambulance service in a way which excludes confusion in the mind of the public. An important role might be played for example by the central control unit in each area which will have to distribute work in a non-discriminatory way, and which would be reached by a single telephone call.

178. The Landkreis, the ASB, the Vertreter des öffentlichen Interesses and the Austrian Government argue, secondly, that some measure of protection of the public ambulance service against competition from independent operators is necessary for the following economic reasons.

179. The presence of independent operators on the market reduces the revenue of the public ambulance service. Since there is only a finite number of transports to be provided, more transports provided by independent operators will entail a corresponding reduction of transports effectuated by the public ambulance service.

180. It is moreover to be expected that independent profit-oriented operators will prefer to provide their services mainly in densely populated areas where distances are short. It is also to be expected that they will prefer to operate mainly on the market of non-emergency transport. That is because emergency transport requires costly investments in equipment and qualified personnel and cost-efficient planning is difficult. Private operators therefore concentrate their activities on non-emergency transport in densely populated areas and thus engage in a form of cherry-picking.

181. The resulting reduction of revenue of the public ambulance service - which is left with non-emergency transport in remote areas and emergency transport - is not compensated for by a corresponding reduction of its costs. That is because the public ambulance service has a legal obligation to provide its services 24 hours a day and throughout the entire territory. The major part of its costs are fixed standby costs (Vorhaltekosten) which arise independently of whether concrete services are actually provided.

182. It must also be borne in mind that losses of the public ambulance service are not only losses for the medical aid organisations, but will generate costs for society as whole. The public ambulance service is financed ultimately either through taxes or through health insurance costs. In the words of the Austrian Government there is thus a serious risk that the inevitable losses of the public ambulance service are socialised, whilst its potential profits are privatised.

183. Subject to one important reservation, I find those arguments convincing.

184. Article 86(2) seeks to reconcile the Member States' interest in using certain undertakings as an instrument of economic or social policy with the Community's interest in ensuring compliance with the rules on competition and the internal market.

185. Since it is a provision permitting derogation from the Treaty rules, it must be interpreted strictly. However, when Member States define the services of general economic interest which they entrust to certain undertakings, they cannot be precluded from taking account of national policy objectives. In that regard it must also be borne in mind that Member States retain competence to organise their public health systems.

186. The Court has also established that for the exception in Article 86(2) EC to apply it is not necessary that the survival of the undertakings entrusted with the service of general interest should be threatened. It is sufficient that, in the absence of the special or exclusive rights at issue, it would not be possible for the undertakings concerned to perform the particular tasks entrusted to them or that the maintenance of those rights is necessary to enable the undertakings concerned to perform their tasks under economically acceptable conditions.

187. It follows in my view from that case-law that a Member State is in principle entitled to reserve both emergency and non-emergency transport to the undertakings which provide the public ambulance service. It is true that such a system will involve cross-subsidisation, which in some circumstances might need scrutiny under the competition rules. Indeed two types of cross-subsidisation are involved here: revenues from densely populated areas contribute to the costs of providing ambulance services to patients from remote areas, and revenues from non-emergency transport contribute to the costs of providing emergency transport. I accept however that the system in issue may help to ensure that the public ambulance service works in acceptable economic conditions. Moreover that type of cross-subsidisation is not as dangerous for competition as transfers of resources from a lucrative reserved sector to a sector under competition (that danger exists for example in the postal sector).

188. I have however one important reservation. If authorisations for independent providers are refused even though medical aid organisations entrusted with the public ambulance service are manifestly unable to satisfy demand (for example at peak hours) the economic reasons which I have just discussed cannot in my view be invoked to justify a restrictive authorisation policy. In those situations a refusal to grant authorisations to independent operators might be financially advantageous for the medical aid organisations involved. That economic advantage would however be gained at the expense of the main objective of the national legislation at issue, namely to provide the population with efficient and high quality ambulance services. It would also be contrary to the objective of Article 86(2) EC which is the efficient provision of services of general economic interest.

189. I accordingly conclude that a provision such as Paragraph 18(3) of the RettDG 1991 is justified under Article 86(2) EC, in so far as it does not preclude authorisations for independent operators where the medical aid organisations operating the public ambulance service are manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand.

IX - Conclusion

190. For the above reasons the question referred should in my view be answered as follows:

On the assumption that the referring court finds that the DRK alone or several medical aid organisations collectively occupy a dominant position on the markets for emergency transport services and patient transport services in Rheinland-Pfalz, a rule under which private operators of ambulance services are to be refused authorisation to provide independent ambulance services where the grant of such an authorisation is likely to have adverse effects on the operation or the profitability of the public ambulance service infringes Article 86(1) EC read in conjunction with Article 82 EC and is not justified under Article 86(2) EC where

- that rule is liable to create a situation in which the medical aid organisation(s) entrusted with the public ambulance service are manifestly not in a position to satisfy demand in particular for rapid and high-quality patient transport services at peak hours, and

- in view of the economic characteristics of the markets in question there is a sufficient degree of likelihood that that rule prevents operators established in other Member States from operating ambulances or establishing themselves in Rheinland-Pfalz.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 8 November 2001. Universale-Bau AG, Bietergemeinschaft: 1) Hinteregger & Söhne Bauges.m.b.H. Salzburg, 2) OSTÜ-STETTIN Hoch- und Tiefbau GmbH v Entsorgungsbetriebe Simmering GmbH. Reference for a preliminary ruling: Vergabekontrollsenat des Landes Wien - Austria. Directive 93/37/EEC - Public works contracts - Definition of 'contracting authority' - Body governed by public law - Restricted procedure - Rules for weighting of criteria for selecting candidates invited to tender - Advertisement - Directive 89/665/EEC - Review procedures relating to public procurement - Time-limits for review. Case C-470/99.

I Introduction

1. In the course of a review of a restricted procedure for the award of a works contract, the Vergabekontrollsenat (Public-procurement review body), Vienna, referred four questions concerning the interpretation of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (hereinafter "Directive 93/37"). (2) They concern the definitions of a contracting authority, in light particularly of a subsequent extension of the tasks of the body concerned, the concept of a public-works contract, the provision of limitation periods for bringing an action and whether the evaluation criteria must be stated in the invitation to tender.

II Applicable law

1. Directive 93/37/EEC

2. Article 1 of Directive 93/37 defines "public works contract" and "contracting authority" as follows:

"For the purpose of this Directive:

(a) "public works contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority;

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

A "body governed by public law" means any body:

established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

having legal personality, and financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

2. Directive 89/665/EEC

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

3. Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (hereinafter "Directive 89/665") (3) provides:

Article 1(1):

"The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC and 77/62/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law."

Article 2(7) and (8):

"7. The Member States shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

8. Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.

The members of such an independent body shall be appointed and leave office under the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office, and their removal. At least the President of this independent body shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. The independent body shall take its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard, and these decisions shall, by means determined by each Member State, be legally binding.

3. Wiener Landesvergabegesetz

4. The Wiener Landesvergabegesetz (Public-procurement law in the Land of Vienna, hereinafter "WLVergG"), (4) in the applicable version for the purposes of the present review procedure, contains the following provisions which are of particular significance in the consideration of the issue of the admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling, regard being had to the question whether the referring Vergabekontrollsenat is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 234 EC.

5. Under Paragraph 94(2), the Vergabekontrollsenat is responsible at first and last instance for deciding applications for review. Its decisions are not liable to be set aside or varied through administrative channels. Under subparagraph 3, the Allgemeines Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz (General Law on Administrative Procedure) and the Verwaltungsvollstreckungsgesetz (Law on Administrative Enforcement) apply to the review procedure, unless otherwise provided for in the WLVergG.

6. Paragraph 95 of the WLVergG states:

"(1) The Vergabekontrollsenat shall consist of seven members. The members shall be appointed by the Land Government for a term of six years. Members shall be eligible for reappointment.

Three members, who may also be experienced officials of the Magistrat (municipal office) of the city of Vienna, shall be appointed after hearing the Gemeinderat (city council), one each after a hearing before the Chamber of Commerce of Vienna, the Chamber of Workers and Employees for Vienna, and the Chamber of Architects and Consulting Engineers for Vienna, Lower Austria and Burgenland. The President shall be a member of the judiciary and shall be appointed after a hearing before the President of the Oberlandesgericht (Higher Regional Court), Vienna. For each member a first, second and third substitute shall be appointed in the same manner. Substitutes, in the order of their appointment, shall represent members in the event of their temporary indisposition or, on expiry of their term of office pending the appointment of a new member. In the event of the departure of a member or a substitute, fresh appointments shall be made without delay.

(2) Members and substitutes must possess special knowledge of public procurement, and in the case of members and substitutes appointed after a hearing before the Gemeinderat that knowledge must be specifically in the economic and technical fields.

(3) A person shall cease to be a member of the Vergabekontrollsenat:

1. on his death;

2. on resignation;

3. if he ceases to be eligible for election to the Nationalrat (national council) (Nationalrats-Wahlordnung (Elections to the National Council Order) 1992, Paragraph 41, BGBl. No 471, as amended by Federal Law BGBl. No 117/1996);

4. on expiry of his term of office;

5. in the case of the President and substitutes, on ceasing to be a member of the judiciary;

6. if he is removed by the Vergabekontrollsenat.

(3a) A member shall be removed from office by a decision of the Vergabekontrollsenat if he is permanently prevented from properly performing his duties owing to physical or mental injury or is guilty of gross dereliction of duty. The decision shall be made after hearing the member concerned. The member concerned shall not be entitled to vote.

(4) Members of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall be independent in the exercise of their office and shall not be bound by instructions.

(5) The members of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall be bound to secrecy under Article 20(3) of the B-VG (Bundesverfassungsgesetz, Federal Constitutional Law).

(6) Meetings of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall be called by the President. Where a member has an interest or is temporarily unable to carry out his duties, his substitute shall be called upon to sit. Members of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall not participate in any decision relating to any procurement procedure concerning the award of a contract in the field of activity of the institution (or, in the case of public servants in the municipal office of the city of Vienna, the department, division or office) to which they belong. If serious grounds exist for doubting a member's impartiality, he must decline to sit and arrange to be represented. Parties may reject members of the Vergabekontrollsenat on showing cause relating to impartiality. The Vergabekontrollsenat shall decide any question relating to the alleged impartiality of a member or any applications for rejection, and the member concerned shall not be entitled to vote thereon. The President shall cause the names of the members of the Vergabekontrollsenat and the institution (or in the case of public servants in the city of Vienna, the department, division or office) to which they belong to be published in the Amtsblatt der Stadt Wien (Official Journal of the City of Vienna) at the start of each calendar year.

(7) Applications shall be decided in the order determined by the President. Orders shall be made in the presence of at least five members by simple majority. Abstentions are not permissible. Sittings shall not be public. A minute shall be made of the proceedings of the sitting. Notices shall be issued in writing. They shall include the names of the members of the Vergabekontrollsenat who took part in the decision. The notice shall be signed by the President. Orders relating to the conduct of the procedure may also be made by any member in accordance with the Rules of Procedure.

(8) The members of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall not be remunerated for their services. They shall be sworn into office by the chief executive of the Land .

(9) Members of the Vergabekontrollsenat shall be reimbursed for any necessary travelling expenses and compensated for their time, for which a rate shall be fixed by the Land Government.

(10) The Vergabekontrollsenat shall adopt its own Rules of Procedure.

(11) The Amt der Wiener Landesregierung (Office of the Government of the Land of Vienna) shall, on a proposal from the Vergabekontrollsenat, place at its disposal the management staff required and, after hearing the President of the Vergabekontrollsenat, the necessary premises. Officials who carry out management tasks shall, in the course of their duties for the Vergabekontrollsenat, be bound only by instructions from the President and the rapporteur for the time being. They may be removed from those duties only after the President has been heard.

Pre-litigation procedure

"Paragraph 96.

(1) If a contractor considers that a decision taken by a contracting authority before the award of a contract infringes this Law and he has been or risks being harmed thereby, he shall formally communicate in writing to the contracting authority a statement of reasons and his intention to institute review proceedings.

(2) On receipt of the communication under subparagraph 1, the contracting authority shall either rectify the alleged infringement without delay and inform the contractor thereof or communicate in writing to the complainant why the alleged infringement does not exist.

Application for review

"Paragraph 97.

(1) An application for review prior to the award of a contract shall be admissible only if the contractor has formally notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to apply for review (Paragraph 96(1)) and the contracting authority has not informed him within two weeks that the infringement has been rectified.

(2) Review may be applied for by:

1. a contractor who claims a business interest in the conclusion of a supply, works, works concession or service contract or a contract in the water, energy, transport or telecommunications sectors, in respect of a ground of nullity under Paragraph 101;

2. a tenderer who claims that the contract was not awarded to him in spite of the inapplicability of the grounds of elimination within the meaning of Paragraph 47 and contrary to Paragraph 48(2).

(3) The application under subparagraph 2 shall contain:

1. the precise designation of the award procedure concerned and of the decision challenged;

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

2. the precise designation of the contracting authority;

3. a precise statement of the facts;

4. particulars of how the applicant risks being or already has been harmed;

5. the grounds on which the allegation of infringement is based;

6. a specific request for a declaration of nullity or amendment;

7. in cases under subparagraph 1, evidence that the contracting authority was notified in a pre-litigation procedure in accordance with Paragraph 96 of the alleged infringement and of the intention to apply for review, and reference to the contracting authority's failure to rectify the infringement within the specified time-limit.

(4) The review procedure does not have a suspensory effect on the contract award procedure to which it relates.

(5) The maximum penalty for abuse (Paragraph 35 of the AVG) which may be imposed in the review procedure shall be 1% of the estimated value of the contract, not exceeding ATS 800 000.

"Paragraph 98.

Applications for review on the ground of the following alleged infringements shall be lodged with the Vergabekontrollsenat within the following time-limits:

1. as regards applications which are refused, two weeks, and where Paragraph 52 applies, three days after notification of the refusal; (5)

2. as regards provisions in the notification by which contractors are invited to apply to take part in a restricted or negotiated procedure or as regards provisions of the invitation to tender, two weeks, and where Paragraph 52 applies, one week before expiry of the date for submitting applications or tenders;

3. as regards the award of a contract, two weeks after the publication of the award in the Official Journal of the European Communities or, where the award is not published, six months after the award of the contract.

III Facts

1. Main proceedings

7. In the Official Gazette of the City of Vienna, Entsorgungsbetriebe Simmering GesmbH (hereinafter "EBS") advertised its intention to award a works contract for the extension of the principal sewage plant in Vienna under a restricted procedure. (6) The intention was to invite the five best-ranked candidates to submit tenders and to award the contract to the most economically advantageous tender in accordance with the criteria set out in the invitation to tender. In the Explanatory Notes on Applications to Take Part, (7) the following appeared under the heading, "Criteria for ranking applications to take part" :

"For the ranking of the applications to take part, the technical operating capacity over the last five years of the candidate, of each member of the consortium of contractors and of the sub-contractors indicated will be taken into account.

The five highest ranked candidates shall be invited to submit a tender.

The evaluation of the applications submitted shall be made according to a scoring procedure. (8)

The following works shall be analysed in the following order:

1. Sewage treatment plants

2. Pre-stressed components

3. Large-scale foundations supported by columns in gravel

4. Oscillating pressure compaction

5. High pressure soil consolidation

The candidate shall identify reference projects completed within the last five years comparable to the tasks to be undertaken.

Only such references as have been carried out by a candidate or a sub-contractor itself, as a leader of a consortium or as the person within a consortium who is responsible for and who carries out the technical aspects shall be evaluated (pro formas are included in the application to take part, point 3).

8. EBS lodged the details of the scoring procedure with a notary on 9 April 1999, that is to say before the first application to take part was submitted. The applicants in the main proceedings, Universale Bau GmbH (hereinafter "Universale") and the Hinterreger and OSTU-STETTIN consortium (hereinafter "the consortium"), were informed in the explanatory notes on applications to take part that they had been lodged with a notary. However, they were not informed of the result of the scoring procedure, or of the evaluation criteria, before the expiry of the time-limit for applications.

9. The applicants in the main proceedings gave notice of their interest in taking part in the restricted procedure. After EBS notified them that they were not among the five best-ranked undertakings and would therefore not be invited to tender, they challenged the procurement procedure before the referring Vergabekontrollsenat.

2. Legal nature and objects of EBS

10. EBS was established in 1976 by Wiener Allgemeine Beteiligungs- und Verwaltungsgesellschaft mbH and BIA Betriebsgesellschaft für Industrieabfall- und Altölbeseitigung GmbH. Each of the two shareholders subscribed for half the share capital. According to the findings of the referring Vergabekontrollsenat, Allgemeine Beteiligungs- und Verwaltungsgesellschaft mbH "was accountable to" the City of Vienna. At the time of the invitation to tender, the shareholdings in EBS were as follows:

Wiener Holding AG ATS 11 075 000

Wiener Stadtwerke ATS 178 500 000

11. According to the findings of the Vergabekontrollsenat, the objects of EBS were initially the design, construction and management of a special waste disposal and waste incineration facility. All its operations were carried out on a commercial basis and in competition with other waste disposal businesses, such as operators of private refuse dumps. EBS alone bore the risk of profit or loss. The deed of incorporation does not warrant any finding that EBS was to meet general-interest needs of a non-industrial or non-commercial nature.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

12. According to clause 10(2) of the relevant EBS' deed of incorporation of 12 September 1996, the Kontrollamt (Review Office) of the City of Vienna is entitled to check both the current account for numerical accuracy, regularity, economy, profitability and expediency and the annual accounts and the situation report including performance, records and other documents, to inspect the business premises and facilities and to report on the result of that inspection to the competent bodies, the shareholders and the City of Vienna.

3. Contracts with the City of Vienna

13. In 1985 EBS entered into a lease with the City of Vienna under which it took over management of the City of Vienna's principal sewage plant with effect from 1 January 1986. Under this agreement, the City of Vienna paid a "reasonable and uniform remuneration to cover the costs of management of the principal sewage plant and of existing waste disposal plants, together with a reasonable return on capital" . According to the findings of the Vergabekontrollsenat, which are confirmed by the parties to the main proceedings, EBS does not perform the task of sewage treatment with a view to profit. Rather, it is a public-service activity entrusted to EBS and carried out on a break-even basis. Thus, EBS' activity in this area is not managed on an industrial or commercial basis. The deed of incorporation was not amended when this task was transferred.

14. By a lease dated 8 July 1996, which replaced the 1985 agreement, the management of the City of Vienna's principal sewage plant was again entrusted to EBS. In addition, EBS undertook to extend the sewage works relating to the project and otherwise to enlarge the Vienna principal sewage plant and EBS' plants in its own name and on its own account (point I.2 of the contract). The City of Vienna was to continue to supply the personnel necessary for the management of the principal sewage plant (point I.3). The City of Vienna undertook to pay a "reasonable and uniform remuneration to ensure coverage by the business of its costs. All the expenses arising out of the extension and operation of the plants including the sewage works relating to the project, less any sums received by EBS, shall... be reimbursed..." (point IV.1).

15. No specific requirements were laid down as regards the structure of the plant. However, EBS is required in points II and III of the contract to ensure that the principal sewage plant operates in a specified way, though the City of Vienna does not have any influence over the actual organisation of the building work.

16. It is clear from the planning notice that EBS applied for planning permission. The owner of the land on which the work is to be executed is the City of Vienna. In a document of 8 September 1999, which was included as annex 8 to the order for reference, EBS stated: "We will retain ownership of the sewage plant extension... The sewage plant will be transferred in the event of termination of the lease and management contract which have been concluded for an indefinite period between the City of Vienna and ourselves. In that case the City of Vienna shall be obliged to take over, inter alia, our sewage plant. It must pay us the current market value of the sewage plant" . According to the Vergabekontrollsenat, such a provision is compatible with Austrian law.

17. The Vergabekontrollsenat excludes any intention on the part of the City of Vienna to circumvent the rules concerning public procurement by establishing EBS and transferring the management and extension of the sewage plant to EBS. EBS was established as early as 1976, but it was not until 1986 that operation of the principal sewage plant was entrusted to it.

IV Questions referred

18. The Vergabekontrollsenat has referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

1. Does a legal person constitute a "contracting authority" within the meaning of Article 1(b)

of Directive 93/37/EEC even if it was not established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, but now meets such needs?

2. If Entsorgungsbetriebe Simmering GesmbH is not a contracting authority, does the planned construction of the second biological treatment phase of the principal sewage plant, Vienna, constitute the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority, and thus a "public works contract" within the meaning of Article 1(a), read in conjunction with Article 1(c), of Directive 93/37/EEC?

3. If Question 1 or Question 2 is answered in the affirmative, does Directive 89/665/EEC preclude a national provision which fixes a time-limit for the review of an individual decision of the contracting authority so that on expiry of that time-limit the decision can no longer be challenged in the course of the ongoing contract award procedure? Is it necessary for the persons concerned to plead every defect, failure to do so entailing loss of their right to do so?

4. If Question 1 or Question 2 is answered in the affirmative, is it sufficient for the body inviting tenders to determine that the applications will be evaluated according to a method lodged with a notary, or is it necessary for the evaluation criteria already to have been communicated in the call for candidates (9) or the tender documents?

V Submissions of the parties and opinion

1. Admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling

19. Admittedly, none of the parties to the proceedings expressed any doubt as to the admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling. However, the Vergabekontrollsenat gave detailed reasons as to why it is entitled to make a reference and the Austrian Government made submissions in that regard. Referring to a judgment of the Court concerning the Tiroler Vergabesenat (Procurement Chamber for the Tyrol), both consider the reference for a preliminary ruling to be admissible. In that case, the Advocate General was of the opinion that the reference for a preliminary ruling was inadmissible, (10) whereas the Court held the question referred to be admissible. (11) The Court has not yet decided whether the referring Wiener Vergabekontrollsenat is entitled to make a reference. The question also arises in Case C-92/00. In his Opinion in that case, Advocate General Tizzano has by implication assumed that the Wiener Vergabekontrollsenat is entitled to make a reference. However, he did not expressly state his view on that question. The judgment in that case is still pending. It is therefore appropriate to express a view on this question in the present proceedings.

20. The Court has consistently held that whether a body making a reference is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC) depends on whether it is established by law, whether it is permanent, whether its jurisdiction is compulsory, whether its procedure is inter partes , whether it applies rules of law and whether it is independent. (12)

21. Under Paragraph 94(2) of the WLVergG, the Vergabekontrollsenat is the body responsible at first and last instance for reviewing decisions by a contracting authority in a procurement procedure. Thus, its activity is established by law and its jurisdiction is compulsory. It is also a permanent body. Decisions of contracting authorities are reviewed in accordance with the WLVergG and, unless otherwise provided therein, under Paragraph 94(3) of the WLVergG, on the basis of the General Law on Administrative Procedure and the Law on Administrative Enforcement. Paragraph 94(2) of the WLVergG guarantees the independence of the Vergabekontrollsenat from the administration, by providing that its decisions are not liable to be varied or set aside through administrative channels. Moreover, Paragraph 95(4) of the WLVergG guarantees that members must be able to exercise their office independently and free from instructions. Subparagraph 6 makes provision in respect of partiality, a criterion on which the Court placed particular emphasis in Köllensperger and Atzwanger . (13) Under Paragraph 95(7), the Vergabekontrollsenat's notices are to be issued in writing. On the basis of these findings the Vergabekontrollsenat may be presumed to satisfy the criteria in the case-law governing definition of a court or tribunal for the purposes of Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC). Accordingly, the reference for a preliminary ruling is admissible.

2. The first question

22. By its first question, the Vergabekontrollsenat asks whether a body which, whilst not established for the specific purpose of performing general-interest tasks, of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature, subsequently takes on and from then actually performs such a task, is to be regarded as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37.

(a) Submissions of the parties

23. Universale, the consortium and the Austrian Government are of the view that EBS is a contracting authority for the purposes of the Directive. That issue is determined by the tasks actually performed by the body at the time of the invitation to tender and the award of the contract, rather than by the terms of its deed of incorporation. In support of its view, the consortium relies on existing case-law, from which it appeared that this term was to be interpreted functionally. The consortium and the Austrian Government do not relate the criterion "established for the specific purpose" to the time of establishment, but submit that subsequent changes actually made should be taken into account. This could be satisfied either by a change to the previous determination of objects or by making provision for the inclusion of an additional object. Otherwise, Directive 93/37 might easily be circumvented by assigning needs in the general interest not to a body having legal personality newly established to that end but to an existing body which previously served other purposes. The consortium suggests that the criterion should be read as "intended by the owners to fulfil the specific purpose" .

24. Conversely, EBS and the Commission are of the view that EBS is not a contracting authority for the purposes of the Directive. In the first place, EBS points out that it was established in 1976 in order to perform the task of incinerating specific waste on a commercial basis. It had to bear the associated economic risk. Only 10 years after it had been established was the general-interest task of sewage disposal transferred to EBS, which it carried out on a break-even basis. However, it had not been established for that purpose. Under the terms of Article 1 of the Directive and of existing case-law, the question whether it was a body governed by public law for the purposes of Directive 93/37 depended on the date of its establishment. The fact that subsequently it began to meet needs in the general interest did not change its status, since it also continued to meet commercial needs. The wording of the Directive precluded the interpretation of the concept of a contracting authority suggested by the applicants in the main proceedings. At most, it would be consistent with that wording to interpret it in such a way as to be regard that body as a contracting authority only to the extent that it performed general-interest tasks, not tasks to meet commercial needs. Thus, EBS suggests a distinction based on the task performed by the body in a given case. The Commission further points out that the alteration of the company's objects was effected neither by an alteration of the objects of the company as stated in the deed of incorporation nor by a statutory provision.

25. Like the consortium, the Netherlands Government points to the functional interpretation it considers to have been given to the concept of a contracting authority in the case-law. On this approach, it reaches the conclusion that a body governed by private law which performs general-interest tasks, though it was not established for that specific purpose, is to be regarded as a contracting authority for the purposes of Directive 93/37. However, like the Commission, it requires this fact to be capable of objective verification. It points out that the wording of Article 1(b), subparagraph

2 of Directive 93/37 does not refer to the legal basis of the tasks performed by the body concerned. In the present case, it cannot be objectively ascertained that EBS performs tasks in the general interest, of a non-industrial or non-commercial nature. Rather, there was an agreement with the City of Vienna (contracting authority) to carry out a public contract or there was a grant of a concession. On this analysis, it must in any event be examined whether the procurement procedure was the appropriate type of procedure.

(b) Opinion

26. The first question concerns the definition of a body governed by public law under Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37. All the parties to the proceedings agree that EBS, as a GmbH (limited liability company), has legal personality and that the City of Vienna, a regional or local authority, has majority control of it.

27. The only matter in dispute is whether EBS also satisfies the third criterion of the statutory definition, that is to say whether EBS was established for the specific purpose of performing general-interest tasks, of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. The parties to the proceedings all agree that in managing the principal sewage plant EBS actually performs a general-interest task. In view of the judgment in BFI Holding , in which the collection and treatment of domestic refuse was regarded as a task performed in the general interest, (14) one is compelled to agree. Since the costs incurred by EBS in this connection are reimbursed by the City of Vienna and to that extent EBS does not bear any cost risk, the task performed is non-commercial in nature, (15) and the referring Vergabekontrollsenat is also proceeding on that basis.

28. However, what is disputed is the extent to which EBS can be regarded as "established for the specific purpose" of performing general-interest tasks of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. According to the findings of the referring Vergabekontrollsenat, EBS was established in 1976 to dispose of special waste on a commercial basis. In its original version, the deed of incorporation did not contain any indication that EBS was intended to be established for the purpose of performing general-interest tasks, of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. Therefore, if reliance is placed solely on the deed of incorporation in force when EBS was established, EBS does not satisfy the conditions laid down in regard to a body governed by public law under Directive 93/37.

29. EBS only took on the management of the sewage plant in 1986. However, this extension of its business activity was not accompanied by any alteration to the objects clause in the deed of incorporation of EBS. Even subsequently, in particular in 1996 when EBS reached agreement with the City of Vienna for an extension to the sewage plant, concerning which the main proceedings arose, the objects clause in the deed of incorporation was not altered. Thus, if reliance were to be placed solely on the deed of incorporation as being determinative of the question raised here, EBS could not be regarded as a contracting authority for the purposes of Directive 93/37.

30. However, in light of the fact that EBS has in actual fact performed general-interest tasks, of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature, since 1986, the conclusion reached on the basis of an analysis of the deed of incorporation appears to be dubious. The applicants in the main proceedings and the Austrian Government therefore rely on a "functional" approach to the concept of a public body and suggest that the subsequent change in the scope of EBS' activities be taken into account and that, irrespective of its deed of incorporation EBS be regarded as a body governed by public law.

31. The criterion of establishment for the specific purpose of performing general-interest tasks has hitherto been considered by the Court in two cases in particular: Case C-44/96 Mannesmann , concerning the Austrian State printing office, and Case C-360/96 BFI Holding . In its judgment in Case C-44/96, the Court relied on the document founding the State printing office, the Bundesgesetz über die Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei (Federal Law on the Austrian State Printing Office). However, in addition to this analysis of the legal foundations of the State printing office, the Court also took account of the actual circumstances, namely that the State printing office subsequently assumed responsibility for other tasks of an industrial or commercial nature. In this respect it held that provided that it continued to perform the tasks which it was specifically obliged to perform, a body did not lose its status as one governed by public law by carrying out other activities. (16) In Case C-360/96, the Court, developing this case-law, held that the fact that meeting needs in the general interest constituted only a relatively small proportion of the activities the entity pursued was also irrelevant, provided that it continued to attend to such needs. (17)

32. On the basis of an analysis of this case-law two points immediately arise. First, under this case-law the focus is not only on the time of establishment, but also on the subsequent evolution of the entity. Second, not only legal but also factual changes in the tasks performed must be taken into account. Consequently, it is immaterial that the original 1976 deed of incorporation did not contain any provision under which EBS was established for the specific purpose of performing general-interest tasks. The time of establishment is not decisive: subsequent developments must also be taken into account. Even the fact that EBS' deed of incorporation was not subsequently amended does not preclude EBS from being classified, none the less, as a body governed by public law. In classifying EBS, the subsequent, actual commencement of the management and extension of the sewage plant must be taken into account.

33. Nor, on the basis of the judgments cited, does the fact that EBS continues to dispose of special waste on a commercial basis in addition to managing the sewage plant preclude its being classified as a body governed by public law for the purposes of Directive 93/37. EBS can at the same time perform tasks on a commercial basis and general-interest tasks of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. EBS need not even perform predominantly general-interest tasks. The proportion of non-commercial activities to commercial activities is irrelevant to the classification of the body. (18)

34. Furthermore, the Court has held that classification as a body governed by public law extends to all the activities carried out by it. (19) That case-law should be upheld. There must be legal certainty concerning the classification of the body concerned. It would be inconsistent with this requirement for the classification to depend on the task performed in each case. Therefore, the submission made by EBS in the alternative, namely that it should be regarded as a contracting authority only in regard to the management of the sewage plant, is to be rejected as incompatible with the case-law.

35. However, it must be pointed out that Case C-44/96, in contrast to the present case, concerned an undertaking which, it was not disputed, had initially been established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. Only subsequently did it start to carry out activities on a commercial basis. In the case of EBS it was exactly the opposite. It was established for industrial and commercial purposes and only subsequently assumed tasks in the general interest, of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. For that reason, it must be examined whether an undertaking can also subsequently acquire the status of a contracting authority.

36. First, the wording of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 militates against that possibility. It expressly requires that the body concerned must have been established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest. Thus, the material date is the date of establishment, or the matter must at least be determined by the deed of incorporation. However, it is not disputed that EBS was not established for the specific purpose of managing the city sewage plant; nor was that object in any way subsequently inserted into the company's statutes, at the time when EBS actually assumed this task.

37. In this regard, one cannot but concur with the view expressed by the Netherlands Government that on the wording of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 the legal analysis is not confined to the body's deed of incorporation. The purpose for which a body has been established can be deduced from other sources as well. (20)

38. As the Netherlands Government and the Commission submit, all that is required is that it may be objectively ascertained that the body exists for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest of a non-industrial and non-commercial nature. Therefore, it is not a requirement that the body was established for that specific purpose since subsequent developments have to be taken into account.

39. General-interest tasks were transferred to EBS by the conclusion of the contract with the City of Vienna. A contract is an objective fact which is just as clearly discernible to an objective bystander as a deed of incorporation or a statute. Therefore, there does not appear to be any reason why this contract, or, to be exact, the two contracts concluded between EBS and the City of Vienna in 1986 and 1996, should not be taken into account for the purpose of determining the objects of EBS. For, as stated, the wording of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 does not confine the analysis to the body's deed of incorporation. On that interpretation of the wording of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37, EBS could be said to be a body governed by public law within the meaning of that provision.

40. That the answer should not be determined solely by the deed of incorporation is also borne out by the following consideration. The application of the provisions concerning public procurement cannot be made to depend on instruments governed by company law, such as a deed of incorporation. Whether as a matter of company law it accurately reflects the company's purpose at the time of establishment or whether, as the case may be, it has been adapted to circumstances which have in actual fact changed, is purely a problem of company law. The interpretation of the public procurement provisions cannot depend on a matter of company law such as that. Otherwise, the application of those provisions would be at the discretion of the shareholders. For that reason, it is not only the deed of incorporation or the company statutes in force on incorporation which are to be taken into account in classifying the body, but also all objectively ascertainable circumstances, which can include a contract such as that concluded between EBS and the City of Vienna.

41. By way of interim conclusion it may be stated that the analysis of the wording of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 does not provide an unambiguous answer to the question raised.

42. Nor, moreover, do the scheme of Article 1 of Directive 93/37 and of the Directive as a whole provide any further guidance as regards the answer to the question raised in the present case.

43. The history of the provision suggests that EBS is to be regarded as a body governed by public law. The statutory definition in Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 was inserted on the initiative of the European Parliament. In its proposal, the Commission had merely referred to "legal persons" instead of bodies governed by public law. (21) In order to ensure that the scope of the Directive concerning works contracts was as comprehensive as possible, the Parliament introduced the concept of "organ governed by public law" , (22) which was subsequently changed to "body" . The inclusion of the statutory definition was intended to replace the registers required to be established under Article 1(b) of Directive 71/305/EEC determining the list of contracting authorities. Its purpose was to ensure that no gaps were left in the application of the Directive. (23) The scope of the Directive was intended also to extend to works contracts performed by third parties and financed, wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, by public funds. (24)

44. As EBS itself concedes, the costs of extending the sewage plant are reimbursed to EBS directly by the City of Vienna under point IV.2 of the contract of 8 July 1996. In light of the purpose pursued by the legislature in formulating the statutory definition, that is to say to make all projects financed out of public funds subject to the laws on public procurement, it is therefore appropriate to regard EBS as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1 of Directive 93/37.

45. This result also accords with the purpose of Directive 93/37. According to its second recital, Directive 93/37 pursues the objective of attaining freedom of establishment at the same time as freedom to provide services in the field of public works contracts. The Directive is intended to counter the risk of preference being accorded to national tenderers or candidates in the award of contracts, thus assisting in the creation of an internal market for works contracts. The decisive factor in examining the criteria determining whether a body is governed by public law is whether there is a risk that the body will allow its decisions on contract awards to be guided by considerations other than economic ones. (25) If so, attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services is jeopardised, which justifies the application of the Directives on public procurement. (26) Ultimately, the question thus arises as to whether the body bears the economic risk of its activity. (27) If it does, attainment of freedom of establishment and free movement of services is not jeopardised, if it does not, that is a reason for applying the directives on public procurement and thereby protecting the fundamental freedoms.

46. Under the 1996 agreement with the City of Vienna, EBS does not bear the financial risk of the management of the sewage plant or of the agreed extension. Admittedly, EBS is to undertake the latter in its own name and on its own account (point I.2 of the contract of 8 July 1996). However, under point IV.1 of the contract "all of the expenses arising out of the construction and management of the plants including the sewage works related to the project, less any sums received by EBS,... shall be reimbursed..." by means of the remuneration to be paid by the City of Vienna. Because the City of Vienna finances the extension works in this way, there is a risk that EBS will allow its decision on the award of works contracts to be guided by factors other than economic ones. To that extent there is a requirement to protect freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services by means of the application of Directive 93/37.

47. It may be inferred from the meaning and purpose of the Directive that the situation of establishment for industrial or commercial purposes and subsequent commencement of activities of a non-industrial or non-commercial nature cannot be treated differently from the decided cases of Mannesmann and BFI Holding , in which the body concerned met needs in the general interest which were of a non-industrial or non-commercial nature from the time it commenced business, and the performance of tasks on a commercial basis came only later. For the time at which a danger to the fundamental freedoms arises is a matter of secondary importance. All that matters is the existence of a danger to those freedoms.

48. This approach is supported principally by the consideration that it is only in this way that it is generally possible to counter the risk of circumvention of the provisions on public procurement. If the question depended on which needs are met first, it would be easy to circumvent the application of the provisions on public procurement by entrusting a body first with needs of a non-industrial or non-commercial nature and only subsequently with needs not having an industrial or commercial character. It is a matter of countering any such circumvention, if it is endeavoured to give practical effect (effet utile) to the provisions on public procurement. Otherwise, the Directive would be devoid of purpose.

49. Admittedly, in the order for reference the referring court expressly rejected any intention on the part of the City of Vienna in the present case to circumvent the rules. However, the interpretation of Article 1 of Directive 93/37 cannot depend on whether on the facts giving rise to the order for reference a risk of circumvention actually subsists. In preliminary reference proceedings, the Court decides on the interpretation of Community law that has significance beyond the individual case.

50. On the basis of the foregoing considerations it must be stated that actually taking over the performance of general-interest tasks, on the basis of objectively ascertainable circumstances such as the conclusion of a contract, may be assimilated to its establishment for that specific purpose. Therefore, it is proposed that the reply to the first question should be as follows:

A legal person constitutes a "contracting authority" within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 even if it was not established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, but which later actually meets such needs, provided that the assumption of such tasks is founded on objectively ascertainable circumstances.

3. The second question

51. By its second question, the referring court asks whether the planned extension to the sewage plant is a public works contract. It raised this question only in the event that EBS could not be categorised as a body governed by public law for the purposes of Directive 93/37. However, since this question has already been answered affirmatively, consideration is given to the second question only in the alternative, in the event that the Court does not adopt the reply proposed in this connection to the first question and does not regard EBS as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37.

(a) Submissions of the parties

52. The consortium and the Austrian Government take the view that it is a public works contract. This was borne out first by the fact that the contract is for the construction of a municipal sewage plant on land belonging to the municipality. Moreover, if the lease is terminated the municipality would be required to take over the plant. The construction was undertaken according to requirements specified by the contracting authority (the City of Vienna) in so far as the extension of the sewage plant served to meet a need in the general interest, the City of Vienna having an interest in ensuring that that need was met. Furthermore, a specific mode of operation is prescribed for the sewage plant, the new construction having to be integrated with the existing plant.

53. By contrast, EBS is of the view that the contract at issue is not a public works contract. The extension works were to be awarded by EBS in its own name and on its own account. Moreover, the City of Vienna did not have any influence on the actual organisation of the extension works or on the procurement procedure itself. The decision as to the technical and structural execution of the works for the sewage plant was to be taken by EBS alone. Finally, it points out that the costs of the extension were to be reimbursed only indirectly, according to the agreements applicable generally to the operation of the sewage plant.

54. Nor does the Commission consider that EBS awards a public works contract. In the present case, there could at most be a contract between the City of Vienna and EBS. However, the Commission is of the opinion that the sewage treatment taken over by EBS, in the context of which the extension to the sewage plant must be viewed, is a contract for services and not a works contract, and for that reason suggests that the second question should be answered in the negative.

55. The Netherlands Government merely formulates general views. The decisive criterion for deciding the question whether the contract is a public works contract is whether the contracting authority has specified particular requirements and that the works must become the property of the contracting authority. Furthermore, in order to be a public works contract, a contract must be carried out on the basis of a specific award by a contracting authority.

(b) Opinion

56. According to the statutory definition in Article 1(a) of Directive 93/37, "public works contracts" are "contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority" . For the purposes of the question referred, EBS should be presumed to be a contractor within the meaning of this provision and contrary to the submissions on the first question not a contracting authority. The relevant written contract is the contract with the City of Vienna, a regional or local authority and thus a contracting authority under Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37. Under that contract EBS assumed the obligation in 1996 to extend the sewage plant leased and managed by it. Under point IV of the agreement, the City of Vienna is obliged to pay EBS reasonable and uniform remuneration for the operation of the plant and to refund the costs arising out of the extension, and therefore the contract is for valuable consideration.

57. The question referred seeks to ascertain to what extent the contract at issue has as its object "... the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority..." . The parties to the main proceedings dispute both whether the object of the contract is the execution of a work and whether the execution of the work corresponds to requirements specified by the City of Vienna.

58. The Commission has doubts as to whether the contract is for the execution of a work and considers rather that it is a contract for services. In that connection it should be stated that under point I.2 of the contract, EBS is obliged to extend the City of Vienna's principal sewage plant. Under point II.1, it is also obliged to treat all waste water, to dispose of the resulting sludge and to dispose of all the special waste delivered by the City of Vienna. Under Annex I A, category 16, of Directive 92/50, (28) sewage and refuse disposal services are services for the purposes of Article 8 of Directive 92/50, for which there is a special procurement procedure. In regard to the obligations on EBS under point II.1, the 1996 agreement is not a contract for works.

59. It is therefore questionable whether, conversely, the obligation in point I.2 to extend the existing plant can be regarded as a works contract for the purposes of Directive 93/37. Admittedly, this obligation involves the execution of works. However, its execution would have to be in accordance with the requirements laid down by the City of Vienna. That is borne out by the fact that the extension is specified at least by reference to its function. The plant is required to be capable of treating all incoming waste water at the rate of up to 18 cubic metres per second (point II.1). In favour of the proposition that the agreement is for the execution of works corresponding to requirements specified by the City of Vienna, it may also be observed that it concerns the extension of a main municipal sewage plant, that is to say a facility for whose operation the City of Vienna is ultimately responsible as a matter of public-health provision. This responsibility is reflected in the assumption of responsibility for costs (point IV), the provision of the necessary personnel (point I.3) and in the obligation on the district to purchase the property on termination of the lease (see EBS' declaration of 8 September 1996, cited in the order for reference).

60. However, the 1996 agreement provides for only one aspect of the way in which the extended plant must function, namely by prescribing a capacity of 18 cubic metres per second. However, the agreement does not contain any provisions as to the actual construction, in particular as regards technical and structural execution. Whether this is sufficient for there to be the execution of works corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority is not free from doubt. Moreover, the contracts for the requisite works are awarded by EBS in its own name and on its own account (point I.2 of the agreement). It is not apparent that the City of Vienna is in any way involved in the formulation of the detailed specifications or in the award of the individual contracts. That means that it is not able to make the general capacity requirement any more specific at a subsequent stage of the award procedure. In Case C-331/92, both the Advocate General in his Opinion and the Court in its judgment emphasised that for there to be a works contract, the works to be executed must be specified in detail. (29) However, the 1996 agreement does not contain any description of works to be executed, but states only the result to be achieved. It follows that the agreement cannot be held to be a public-works contract.

61. For the sake of completeness, it must also be noted that even if one were to regard the specification of the purposes of the works to be sufficient, there would be yet another point to examine. As established above, the 1996 agreement also contains elements of a contract for services. According to the 16th recital of Directive 92/50, it follows from Directive 71/305/EEC, "... that for a contract to be a public works contract, its object must be the achievement of a work; whereas, in so far as these works are incidental rather than the object of the contract, they do not justify treating the contract as a public works contract." Under the terms of Case C-331/92 the referring court would therefore have to consider whether any obligation to execute a work is predominant in relation to the agreed obligation to supply services. (30)

62. Without anticipating the judgment of the national court, one can hardly imagine, on the basis of the circumstances of the present case as described, that the execution of work would be held to predominate. Instead, the agreement is the continuation of 10 years' cooperation, and the agreed works, if at all, are the adaptation of existing capacity to changed circumstances. Primarily, it must therefore involve the continuance of responsibility for sewage and waste water disposal which, as already explained above, constitutes a service.

63. In light of the foregoing, it is submitted in the alternative that the second question should be answered as follows:

A contractual provision which describes the work only by reference to the function to be fulfilled and at the same time is the continuation of an existing contract for services is not a public works contract within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Directive 93/37.

4. The third question

64. By its third question the Vergabekontrollsenat seeks to ascertain whether the limitation periods of two weeks provided for in Paragraph 98 of the WLVergG are compatible with Council Directive 89/665 of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts. (31)

(a) Submissions of the parties

65. Universale and the consortium regard the time-limits for bringing proceedings provided for in the WLVergG as too short. According to Universale, foreign tenderers are usually unable to adhere to these time-limits. On the one hand, that defeats the objective of ensuring that public contracts are awarded without discrimination and, on the other, frustrates the objective of giving undertakings access to a large common market while strengthening the competitiveness of European undertakings. As evidence of the correctness of its view of the law it points to the fact that the time-limit has in the meantime been extended to four weeks. As a matter of fact, it again emphasises that it was in a position to notice the mistake in the conditions in the invitation to tender only when studying the evaluation of the application documents after EBS had already rejected it and after the two-week time-limit had expired. The consortium adds that in the short period for bringing proceedings candidates are not in a position to analyse the contracting authority's reasons for elimination and expose those which are without substance. Furthermore, the obligation in Paragraphs 96 and 97 of the WLVergG to give the contracting authority prior notice of a challenge means that the two-week time-limit for bringing proceedings, which runs from the date of notification of the rejection, has already expired by the time the contracting authority to whom notice has been given replies to the candidate.

66. In contrast, EBS points to the discretion granted to the Member States by Directive 89/665. The Community legislature required only that decisions taken by awarding departments could be reviewed as rapidly as possible (Article 1(1)), that the review procedures had to be available to any person who had an interest in a contract and who risked being harmed by the alleged infringement (Article 1(3)), that Member States could require prior notice to be given to the contracting authority (Article 1(3)) and finally that interim measures had to be available, unlawful decisions set aside and damages awarded to tenderers who were harmed (Article 2(1)). In EBS' view, short time-limits correspond to the objective in the fifth recital to the Directive of not causing disproportionate delay to the performance of public contracts. However, national procedural rules cannot render the enforcement of Community law impossible in practice. Finally, EBS points out that a time-limit of two weeks for bringing proceedings against State acts is in general usual and, as evidence thereof, refers to Paragraph 63(5) of the General Law on Administrative Procedure, under which every challenge to a decision by an authority must be made within two weeks, as well as to Paragraph 403(3) of the EO, (32) under which interim measures granted by civil courts are to be challenged within two weeks.

67. The Austrian and Netherlands Governments, as well as the Commission, point out first that Directive 89/665 itself does not fix any time-limits, but merely lays down minimum requirements. The Member States have a discretion as regards fixing time-limits for bringing proceedings. However, all three emphasise that the Directive requires that effective legal protection be provided. Moreover, the Austrian Government observes that time-limits for bringing proceedings have the effect of speeding up the procedure and of reducing the risk of any abusive resort to legal action. Both correspond to the objectives of Directive 89/665. The Commission also submits that the legal protection must not be less favourable than for similar actions concerning national law only.

68. As regards the time-limit fixed by the WLVergG for challenging provisions contained in a public contract notice, it should first of all be observed that Directive 89/665 merely lays down minimum requirements as to the legal protection to be secured. It contains no provisions either as to the period within which specific acts may be challenged or as to whether or not national implementing measures may contain limitation provisions.

69. In the context of actions for repayment of charges paid unduly, the Court has held that, in the absence of Community rules, it is for the Member States to lay down the procedural rules under which citizens of the Union can exercise the rights conferred on them by Community law. However, such procedural rules must not be less favourable than those in respect of similar rights conferred by national law (principle of equivalence) and must not render virtually impossible the exercise of rights conferred by Community law (principle of effectiveness). (33) In this context, the Court has also held that it is essentially compatible, in the interests of legal certainty, with the principle of effectiveness to lay down reasonable limitation periods for bringing proceedings. Such time-limits are not liable to render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law. (34) In the absence of Community rules on limitation periods, no objection can be raised under the case-law cited to the enactment in the WLVergG of time-limits for bringing proceedings. In that connection, the national legislature has a margin of discretion.

70. However, the Directive specifies inter alia the following objectives to be achieved by implementation and whose realisation must not be defeated by the enactment of limitation provisions. Decisions of contracting authorities must be able to be reviewed effectively and as rapidly as possible (Article 1(1)); the Member States may provide that the contracting authority must be notified in advance of the intention to seek review (Article 1(3)); the national legislature must ensure the availability of interim measures and enable unlawful decisions to be set aside and damages to be awarded (Article 2(1)).

71. However, effective legal protection for the purposes of Directive 89/665 is guaranteed only if the time-limits do not render impossible enforcement of the legal protection granted. For that reason, the time-limits must not be so short as to prevent tenderers and candidates from exercising their rights. In view of the fact that Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires a contracting authority's decisions to be reviewed as rapidly as possible, a time-limit of two weeks as provided for in the WLVergG appears not to be unreasonable. In particular, it should in principle be possible for foreign candidates to comply with it and to allow the candidates concerned time to clarify whether their rights have been infringed. The enactment of limitation periods in the procedural rules also promotes legal certainty. Candidates in whose favour a decision has been taken should be entitled to rely on the unchanged continuance of their legal position.

72. The extent to which this legal protection is equivalent to the legal protection granted for the enforcement of legal rights conferred by national provisions and the extent to which it follows that the principle of equivalence is complied with remains a question for the national court within the framework of its analysis of national law. The order for reference is silent in that regard. A priori, however, the submissions of the parties to the proceedings, in particular the time-limits under the General Law on Administrative Procedure referred to by EBS for bringing proceedings, indicate that there are no doubts. In undertaking its examination, the referring court must also consider whether the challenge may be lodged only by recorded delivery or, for example, by fax or by e-mail as well. The required form has consequences as regards the period of the time-limit allowed.

73. As regards the consortium's complaint, that the obligation in Paragraphs 96 and 97 of the WLVergG to notify the contracting authority in advance results in expiry of the period for bringing an action under Paragraph 98 of the WLVergG by the time the contracting authority replies to the candidate, it must be pointed out that the time-limits can hardly ever overlap. Paragraphs 96 and 97 of the WLVergG concern a time-limit prior to the award of the contract, whereas the time-limits in Paragraph 98(1) and (3) of the WLVergG refer to time-limits after the award of the contract. Nor, in relation to the time-limit in subparagraph 2 of that provision, is there ever likely to be a conflict. Admittedly, this provision is concerned with a period prior to expiry of the application period and thus also prior to the award of the contract. The time-limit provided for in Paragraph 98 relates to challenges to conditions in the public notice. On the other hand, the time-limit provided for in Paragraph 96 of the WLVergG concerns "a decision taken by a contracting authority before the award of a contract" . Whether conditions in the public notice can also constitute such a "decision" is a question to be decided by the referring Vergabekontrollsenat by reference to national law. Only if this question is answered affirmatively could there be overlaps resulting in a problem as regards the effectiveness of the legal protection ensured. However, that is not a necessary inference from the wording of the provisions of the WLVergG.

74. Therefore, it is proposed that the third question should be answered as follows: Directive 89/665 does not preclude a national provision which fixes a time-limit for the review of an individual decision of the contracting authority in such a way that, on expiry of that time-limit, the decision can no longer be challenged in the course of the ongoing contract award procedure, provided that it is ensured that the legal protection afforded is not less favourable than for comparable rights conferred by national law and the exercise of the rights conferred by Directive 89/665 is not rendered impossible in practice. In that connection, every defect in the procedure must be pleaded by the persons concerned, subject to loss of the right to object in the event of failure to do so.

5. The fourth question

75. The Vergabekontrollsenat's fourth question concerns the content of the contract notice to be published by the contracting authority. It concerns whether and to what extent the evaluation criteria by reference to which the candidates to be invited to tender are selected must be stated in the contract notice or in the tender documents.

(a) Submissions of the parties

76. As regards the scoring procedure, Universale and the consortium complain of an infringement of the principle of transparency and intelligibility. Universale believes that the weight attached to the individual selection criteria listed must be clearly stated in the invitation to tender so as to preclude arbitary decisions. For that reason, not only the order of importance of the criteria but also their relative weight, and thus an objectively intelligible evaluation scheme, must be indicated in the prior information or in the tender documents. This is not guaranteed where the evaluation scheme is lodged with a notary.

77. In the final analysis, the Netherlands Government shares that view. Applications must be evaluated transparently and objectively. Therefore, candidates must be able to find out in advance how and against what criteria the candidates will be evaluated.

78. In contrast, EBS points to Article 30(2) of Directive 93/37. This provides only that the award criteria are to be indicated and, where possible, though not necessarily, in order of the importance attributed to them. Nor is it possible to infer a requirement for complete transparency from primary Community law. Therefore, lodgement of the evaluation yardsticks with a notary is unobjectionable.

79. The Austrian Government and the Commission also point out that Directive 93/37 does not contain any detailed provisions concerning the evaluation of applications to take part within the framework of the public prospecting of candidates in a restricted procedure. The Austrian Government relies on Article 22 of Directive 93/37, which makes no provision as to the procedure for selecting candidates. On general principles, the procedure chosen must be objective and non-discriminatory. However, there is no obligation to advertise in advance in the tender documents the evaluation scheme for selecting the candidates to be invited to tender. The Commission points out that under Article 11(6) of the Directive, only specified documents may be requested. The selection must be based on these documents.

80. As regards the fourth question, it may first be observed that Directive 93/37 does not make any express provision concerning the extent to which the evaluation procedure adopted by the contracting authority is to be explained in detail in the notice of a restricted procedure or in the tender documents.

81. However, in a number of places the Directive contains statements concerning the publication of selection criteria. Under Article 7(2), a negotiated procedure may be carried out only if the candidates have been selected in accordance with published qualitative criteria. From this it follows that the qualitative criteria are to be advertised, but not that the mechanism to be applied in evaluating the individual criteria must also be advertised.

82. Article 11(6) states what information contracting authorities may request from candidates. As the Commission rightly inferred, the criteria which may be applied in selecting candidates may be discerned from this. However, this does not say whether the candidates must be told of the system applied in evaluating the individual details.

83. Article 13(2) specifies the minimum information to be included in the invitation to tender in a restricted procedure. Under subparagraph 2(e), this also includes the criteria for the award of the contract. However, nor does this provision require publication of the evaluation system on which the contracting authority bases its selection.

84. Articles 18 and 22 provide that the candidates invited to tender in a restricted procedure are to be selected on the basis of the information given by the candidates relating to the contractor's position and on the basis of the information and formalities necessary for the evaluation of the minimum economic and technical requirements to be fulfilled by him. However, nor do these provisions say anything concerning the evaluation of the individual criteria.

85. Finally, Article 30(2) of the Directive requires that where the award is to be made to the most economically advantageous tender all the award criteria to be used are to be stated in the contract documents or in the contract notice. "Where possible" , they are to be stated in order of importance. Admittedly, it can be inferred from this that all the criteria on which the selection is to be based must be advertised. However, even Article 30 merely requires that the criteria on the basis of which the award is made should be indicated. Furthermore, the wording of the provision itself contains the qualification that "where possible" , this must be done in order of importance. It may be supposed that this means that the contracting authority is in principle under a duty to state the criteria in the order of the importance attached to them. The wording of the provision does not necessarily require such an interpretation. However, it accords with the purpose of Directive 93/37 to make the award of public works contracts more transparent (see the 10th to 12th recitals of the Directive). However, even this interpretation does not achieve the aim sought by the applicants in the main proceedings. For once the contracting authority gives equal weight to two criteria, the order in which they appear no longer corresponds to the weight attached to them. Moreover, "order" cannot be equated to "details of a scoring procedure" . Therefore, even a strict observance of Article 30(2) does not require the details of the "scoring procedure" applied by EBS to be indicated. Thus, it must be stated that the abovementioned provisions of Directive 93/37 do not support the legal argument of the plaintiffs in the main proceedings.

86. Nor is it possible to derive support for Universale's and the consortium's legal argument from the Directive's purpose of attaining freedom of establishment and freedom of movement for persons in respect of public works contracts (see the second recital). For this objective is intended to be achieved by the advertisement of the individual works contracts to be awarded. The fourth question does not concern the advertisement of a works contract for the purpose of giving domestic and foreign undertakings the same opportunity to submit their applications. Instead, it goes beyond that and concerns an insight into the evaluation scheme which the contracting authority intends to use when selecting candidates.

87. The procedure followed by EBS, namely to state in the contract notice the criteria for the ordering of the applications to participate (technical capacity and award to the most economically advantageous tender), as well as the statement in the tender documents that the bids submitted by the candidates would be evaluated according to a method lodged with a notary, precludes the possibility that national candidates are better placed than candidates from other Member States. The award criteria are known to all the candidates but not the details of the scoring procedure. In this way, the attainment of the objective of the transparency requirement in Directive 93/37 is secured. The text in force provides no warrant for more extensive requirements as regards publication of the evaluation procedure.

88. The restricted obligation here proposed of advertising the applicable award criteria, where possible, in the order of importance attached to them is not only consistent with the wording of Directive 93/37. It also meets the concern of determining the "best" tenderer in the course of a tender procedure. If the method of award is advertised in advance then it must be expected that candidates will base their tenders on it and provide evidence of their capability particularly as regards the points given a heavier weighting. Only in this way can they obtain admission to the category of those subsequently invited to submit a tender. However, tailoring the application to the selection method in this way creates a risk that the contracting authority may obtain a distorted impression of the candidates from the documents submitted. Yet the purpose of this part of the procedure is to give the contracting authority a comprehensive picture of the candidates' technical capability. This is best done if the candidates give as comprehensive a picture of themselves as possible, admittedly on the basis of the award criteria indicated, but without knowing the selection method, that is to say the details of the evaluation.

89. It is important to emphasise that under Article 8(3) of Directive 93/37 the contracting authority is obliged to draw up a written report. It includes the reasons for selecting a candidate and the reasons for rejecting the other candidates. That ensures the reviewability by the courts of the contracting authority's decision, and thus also the previously unpublished evaluation criteria. The solution here suggested takes into account the various interests of the participants in the selection procedure. It prevents any possible discrimination, does not impose any requirements in regard to transparency on the procurement procedure that are not justified by either the wording of the Directive or the general principles of Community law and are thus excessive, and ensures reviewability by the courts.

90. Accordingly, it is proposed that the fourth question should be answered as follows: It is sufficient for the purposes of Directive 93/37 for the body inviting tenders to determine that the applications will be evaluated according to a method lodged with a notary. The details of the weighting of the selection criteria need not be published either in the contract notice or in the tender documents, but must be capable of being reviewed by the courts.

VI Conclusion

91. For the foregoing reasons, it is proposed that the questions referred by the Vergabekontrollsenat Wien should be answered as follows:

(1) A legal person constitutes a "contracting authority" within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37/EEC even if it was not established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, but which subsequently meets such needs, provided that the assumption of such tasks is founded on objectively ascertainable circumstances.

(2) A contractual provision which describes the work only by reference to the function to be fulfilled and at the same time is the continuation of an existing contract for services is not a public works contract within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Directive 93/37.

(3) Directive 89/665/EEC does not preclude a national provision which fixes a time-limit for the review of an individual decision of the contracting authority in such a way that, on expiry of that time-limit, the decision can no longer be challenged in the course of the ongoing contract award procedure, provided that it is ensured that the legal protection afforded is not less favourable than for comparable rights conferred by national law and the exercise of the rights conferred by Directive 89/665 is not rendered impossible in practice. In that connection every defect in the procedure must be pleaded by the persons concerned, subject to loss of the right to object in the event of failure to do so.

(4) It is sufficient for the purposes of Directive 93/37 for the body inviting tenders to determine that the applications will be evaluated according to a method lodged with a notary. The details of the weighting of the selection criteria need not be published either in the contract notice or in the tender documents, but must be capable of being reviewed by the courts.

I - Introduction

1. Five questions for preliminary ruling on the interpretation of Article 30(4) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (hereinafter the Directive or Directive 93/37/EEC) have been referred to the Court of Justice by the Fourth Chamber of the Consiglio di Stato (Council of State) della Repubblica Italiana, sitting as a judicial body, ruling on appeals lodged respectively against two judgments of the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per il Lazio (Regional Administrative Court, Lazio).

2. The question referred by the Consiglio di Stato to the Court of Justice is based on essential principles of Community law on public contracts, principles that cannot be renounced, concerning the setting of objective criteria for participation in calls for tender and the award of public contracts, as part of a transparent procedure in which any measures and provisions which may have discriminatory effects are prohibited.

3. In cases of this kind, the emphasis is placed on abnormally low tenders in respect of a contract. Emphasis is placed, in particular, on the procedure for excluding such tenders, such a procedure being effected in order to clear the field prior to the award of contracts by rejecting proposals which do not display sufficient creditworthiness. One further principle of Community law on public contracts must be respected: the principle of efficiency.

4. As regards abnormally low tenders, the Consiglio di Stato raises doubts concerning the compatibility of the following with Article 30(4) of the Directive:

(1) the establishment of a mechanism for automatically setting a threshold on the basis of which a tender is considered abnormally low which prevents undertakings from ascertaining the threshold level before submitting their tenders.

(2) the exclusion from the outset of tenders not accompanied by an explanation in respect of the price for an amount equal to at least 75% of the figure specified in the tender conditions and the fact that only certain explanations are admissible, with those referring to minimum figures which can be inferred from official lists being ruled out.

(3) provision for a procedure in which, after the opening of the envelopes, and before the adoption of the measure excluding an undertaking, those undertakings which have submitted irregular tenders have no opportunity to state their reasons and clarify their position.

II - Law

1. Community law

5. Directive 71/305/EEC which constituted a first step towards the coordination of laws of the Member States in respect of public works contracts had as its main purpose the simultaneous attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in respect of public works contracts. That Directive took account of the possibility that abnormally low tenders might be submitted and

Article 29(5) made provision for their possible exclusion.

6. Directive 71/305/EEC was amended substantially and on a number of occasions, for which reason its consolidation was appropriate, this being realised in Directive 93/37/EEC. In Article 30(4) the new text simply reproduced, with minor amendments, the text of Article 29(5) of Directive 71/305/EEC of the Directive as it stood following the 1989 amendment. Article 30(4) states that:

If, for a given contract, tenders appear to be abnormally low in relation to the works, the contracting authority shall, before it may reject those tenders, request, in writing, details of the constituent elements of the tender which it considers relevant and shall verify those constituent elements taking account of the explanations received.

The contracting authority may take into consideration explanations which are justified on objective grounds including the economy of the construction method, or the technical solution chosen, or the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer for the execution of the work, or the originality of the work proposed by the tenderer.

If the documents relating to the contract provide for its award at the lowest price tendered, the contracting authority must communicate to the Commission the rejection of tenders which it considers to be too low.

2. Italian law

7. Article 30(4) of the Directive was transposed into Italian law in Article 21(1a) of Law No 109 of 11 February 1994, outline law on the subject of public works, appended to the original text in Article 7 of Law No 216 of 2 June 1995. That law states that:

In cases of awards of contracts for works of ECU 5 million or above on the basis of the lowest-bid criterion mentioned in paragraph 1, the authority concerned must assess the irregular nature of the tenders referred to in Article 30 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 in relation to all tenders undercutting the indicative price by more than the percentage fixed by 1 January of each year by decree of the Minister of Public Works, after hearing the views of the Monitoring Authority, having regard to the tenders admitted to the procedures held in the previous year.

To that end the public administration may take account only of explanations based on the economy of the construction method or of the technical solutions chosen, or the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer, but not of explanations relating to all those elements for which minimum values are laid down by legislation, regulations or administrative provisions or for which minimum values can be inferred from official data. Tenders must be accompanied, when submitted, by explanations concerning the most significant price components, indicated in the tender notices or the letters of invitation, which together add up to not less than 75% of the amount indicated in the tender notice.

8. By the Ministerial Decrees of 28 April 1997 and 18 December 1997 issued under the first subparagraph of Article 21(1a) of Law No 109/1994 for 1997 and 1998 respectively the Minister of Public Works determined the irregularity threshold beyond which there would be an obligation on the part of the contracting authority to verify the tender in question :... an extent equal to the arithmetical mean of the percentage discounts in all the tenders admitted, increased by the arithmetical mean of the difference in the percentage discounts which are in excess of the said mean.

III - Facts and the main proceedings

1. Case C-285/99

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

9. The Italian National Highways Authority (hereinafter the ANAS) published a notice calling for tenders, under a restricted procedure, for works described as RM 87/97 - GRA Motorway - stretch 19 - widening to three lanes in both directions from km 43 + 280 to km 46 + 500.

10. The temporary association of undertakings constituted by Lombardini SpA - Impresa Generali di Costruzioni (hereinafter: Lombardini), Collini - Impresa di Costruzioni SpA and Trevi SpA was invited to participate in the tender procedure by letter No 1723 of 15 October 1997. In so far as is relevant and in accordance with the provisions of Article 21(1a) of Law No 109/1994, the letter of invitation contained the following information:

A. The requirement upon applicants to include with their bids explanations concerning the most significant price indications equivalent to 75% of the figure specified in the tender. The explanations were to be drafted in accordance with the format attached to the letter of invitation and were to be included in the envelope containing the administrative documentation to be submitted.

B. The requirement to attach, in a separate envelope, the necessary documentation for verification of the data in the explanatory breakdown accompanying the bid. The envelope would be opened and its contents examined only if the bid exceeded the arithmetical threshold indicative of irregularity.

C. A warning that failure to respect any of the above requirements would mean exclusion of the bids.

D. Criteria on the basis of which tenders suspected of being irregular would be verified.

11. The bid by Lombardini was qualified as abnormally low, by reason of which the envelopes containing the explanatory documentation were opened. After consideration, the bid was rejected and the contract awarded to Società Italiana per Condotte d'Acqua.

12. Lombardini immediately lodged a complaint with the Tribunale Administrativo Regionale per il Lazio regarding the contract notice, the letter of invitation, its own exclusion and the award of the contract. Its applications were dismissed by that court and Lombardini therefore lodged an appeal invoking amongst other arguments incorrect and inappropriate interpretation of Article 30 of Directive 93/37.

2. Case C-286/99

13. ANAS published a contract notice for the award, under restricted procedure, of a corresponding contract to complete the second stage of construction work of the Bergamo/Zanica stretch of provincial road No 115.

14. Mantovani SpA (hereinafter Mantovani), in temporary association with another undertaking, was invited to participate in the tender procedure by a letter stating that the award would be made in accordance with Article 21(1a) of Law No 109/1994 in the version in Article 7 of Law No 216/1995, and stating that irregularity of the tenders would be assessed in accordance with Article 30(4) of the Directive and the criteria outlined in the Ministerial Decree of 28 April 1997. The letter of invitation set out the requirements for contractors and warnings about exclusion similar to those mentioned above in the description of the facts of Case C-285/99.

15. Mantovani submitted a figure which exceeded the irregularity threshold, for which reason its application was considered irregular. After the bid had been examined in conjunction with the related explanations and the data submitted for analysis, it was declared inadmissible. The contract was awarded to the temporary association of undertakings Bregoli/Roda.

16. Contesting the inadmissibility of its bid, Mantovani lodged a complaint concerning the contract notice, the letter of invitation, the decision to exclude it from the awards procedure and the award itself. The Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per il Lazio dismissed the action in Judgment

No 1498 of 26 June 1998.

17. Mantovani appealed, alleging breach of Article 30(4) of the Directive in so far as the procedure for verifying admissibility of the bids ... is in breach of Community principles which prohibit any automatic exclusion and regarding... improper conduct of the oral proceedings after it had been ascertained that the bid indicated irregularities.

IV - Questions for preliminary ruling

18. The Consiglio di Stato believes that in order to resolve both appeals, the exact scope of Article 30(4) of the Directive must be established as regards the reference to the procedure for verification of abnormally low bids, and it therefore puts the following questions to the Court of Justice:

(1) Does recourse to a clause in calls for tenders for public works contracts which prevents the participation of undertakings which have not submitted with their tenders explanations in respect of the price indicated, being equal to at least 75% of the figure specified in the tender conditions, represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37?

(2) Does the establishment of a mechanism for automatically identifying tenders which overstep a threshold indicative of irregularities and whose validity should therefore be checked, based on a case-by-case criterion and an arithmetical mean, which is such that undertakings are unable to ascertain that threshold in advance, represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37?

(3) Does the fact that provision is made for a prior exchange of views, without the undertaking which has allegedly submitted an irregular tender having an opportunity to state its reasons, after the opening of the envelopes and before the adoption of the measure excluding it, represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37?

(4) Does a provision under which the contracting authority may take account of explanations relating solely to the economy of the construction method or the technical solutions adopted or the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37?

(5) Does the exclusion of explanations relating to items for which minimum figures can be inferred from official lists represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37?

V - Proceedings before the Court of Justice

19. By Order of 14 September 1999, the President of the Court decided to join the two sets of proceedings given that they were, in objective terms, interrelated.

20. The Commission, the Italian and Austrian Governments, the applicants in the main action, Lombardini and Mantovani, and Coopsette (intervener in the dispute initiated by Mantovani), submitted written observations before the relevant deadline established under Article 20 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice.

21. At the hearing on 3 May 2001 all the parties, with the exception of the Austrian Government, appeared to put their submissions orally.

VI - Consideration of questions for preliminary ruling

22. The five questions referred by the Consiglio di Stato can be grouped, as indicated in paragraph 4 of this Opinion, into three categories:

(1) Automatic setting of the threshold indicative of irregularity. This refers to the second question.

(2) Explanations of the price submitted and the nature of those explanations. This refers to the first, fourth and fifth questions.

(3) No system of hearings for undertakings whose tenders are abnormally low before they are excluded. This concerns the third question in the order for reference.

23. My arguments will follow the above outline; however, there should initially be some consideration, even if only superficial, of the principles in Community law which underlie the system of awarding public contracts, in order better to understand the rules in Article 30(4) of the Directive.

1. Principles underlying selection of a contractor

24. The Directives on public contracts, each one concerned with a specific field, aim to promote the development of effective competition in the sector of public contracts by realising three of the fundamental freedoms of European integration (free movement of goods, freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services). Those directives aim to give effect to the requirements set out by the Community legislature in Articles 9, 52 and 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Articles 23 EC, 43 EC and 49 EC).

25. Giving effect to those requirements and the pursuit of that objective can only be achieved if those who wish to be awarded public contracts can apply on an equal basis, without any discrimination whatsoever; to this end, a system based on objectivity at all levels, in terms of both substance and form, is indispensable. Firstly, by setting objective criteria for participation in the tender and award of contracts. Secondly, by making provision for open procedures in which transparency is the norm.

26. The criteria for participation or selection on the basis of quality refer to the suitability of applicants, to their skills and experience, both professional, economic and technical. To rule out any discriminatory effect, it is necessary in each case to predetermine, within the framework of the law, rules governing the procedure, as well as the levels of skill and experience required.

27. Once the tenderers qualifying for award of the contract have been selected upon application of the rules on participation, that award is also subject to objective parameters of assessment, whether the lowest bid or the most economically advantageous. If the second criterion is applied the awarding authority must set out in advance the selection criteria in the contract documents or contract notice, stating their respective importance.

28. As can be seen, the system is intended to ensure that nothing is left to chance or subject to any arbitrary decision on the part of the body awarding the contract. The system whereby tenderers apply on an equal footing, which must underlie the award of public contracts, means that any person who wishes to be awarded a contract of this kind must know beforehand what he must do to be awarded it, so that the awarding body is confined (given the discretion involved in the technical evaluation) to applying parameters set out in the rules, both those rules governing public contracts in a general sense, and those which involve in particular a specific contract, that is to say the contract documents or the contract notice.

29. To ensure that such a system is effective and that there is no discrimination in the award of public contracts, it is not sufficient to set objective criteria for participation and award of the contracts, but application of the criteria must be based on transparency. This must apply from the time of the contract notice, in the contract documents and, finally, in the selection stage itself, as well as in the open procedures and restricted procedures.

30. Those principles must be applied remembering that the award of public contracts is a way of managing public interests in which authorities invite persons - natural persons or legal persons - to collaborate in realising objectives asked of them which, in every instance, require an efficient response. On certain occasions, such efficiency is in conflict with the pace which a selection procedure, complete with guarantees, requires. For this reason the Directive excludes certain contracts from its field of application and, in particular cases, ordinary procedures for award of contracts and brings forward the time-limits in some instances.

2. Article 30(4) of the Directive

31. Article 30(4) is part of the rules on award of the contract and, for the purpose of speeding up the process, authorises the rejection of tenders considered abnormally low in relation to the works. However, a rejection may not be made automatically as Community law requires the awarding authority: (1) before adopting its decision to give the tenderer the chance to provide details of the constituent elements of the tender, asking for any details it considers relevant, and (2) to that end, to take into consideration explanations submitted to it, especially those relating to the economy of the construction method, the technical solution chosen, the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer for the execution of the work, or the originality of the work proposed.

32. There are three consequences deriving from the above:

1a. The concept of an abnormally low tender is not an abstract concept; on the contrary, it is defined by reference to the contract to be awarded and to the work involved.

2a. The awarding authority must examine the tenders which it considers to be abnormally low in order to be able to reject them.

3a. The decision to exclude may be adopted only after giving the tenderer the possibility of providing explanations regarding the tender, or after applying an oral verification procedure.

3. Automatic setting of the threshold indicative of irregularity

33. As we have seen, Italian law sets out a mathematical, and thus automatic, system for setting the irregularity threshold. It consists of a percentage set by the Ministry of Public Works on 1 January each year. For the years 1997 and 1998, recognising that it was impossible to set a single threshold for the whole country, the Ministry used a mathematical formula, which varied according to the contract, consisting ... of an extent equal to the arithmetical mean of the percentage discounts in all the tenders admitted, increased by the arithmetical mean of the difference in the percentage discounts which are in excess of the said mean. The contracting authority is required to verify all tenders exceeding that threshold.

34. A system such as that described above conforms to the requirements of Article 30(4) of the Directive and the principles underlying selection of the contractor.

35. I have stated that, according to Article 30(4), the concept of an abnormally low tender is very precise and must be determined for each contract according to the specific purpose it is intended to fulfil. In my view, an irregularity threshold based on a figure calculated using the bids submitted for a contract, bids which, by definition, are made in accordance with the purpose of the contract, is perfectly in line with the aims of the Directive. As the representative of Mantovani stated at the hearing, the system allows the market to establish the threshold, above which a tender may be considered irregular, for each contract. Moreover, given that the criterion represents an objective figure, all applicants are on an equal footing. No party has any advantage with respect to the others in submitting its bid.

36. However, this system suffers from an absence of transparency. Those parties wishing to participate in the award of the contract do not know when they submit their tender the threshold beyond which that tender may be considered as abnormally low. Furthermore, the awarding authority does not know that threshold either. This is the price which must be paid, however, if the legal concept of abnormally low tenders is to be a priori not pre-determined, but perfectly capable of being determined in relation to each contract, in particular as required by Article 30(4) of the Directive.

37. Admittedly, automatic setting of the irregularity threshold, together with the requirement to submit explanations of the price with the tender and during the exclusion stage, before the verification procedure and without a hearing, of those tenders which are abnormally low may be incompatible with the requirements of the Directive. However, that consequence cannot per se be put down to the system of setting the irregularity threshold, but to the enforcement of that requirement or to implementation of the exclusion system.

38. In Fratelli Costanzo the Court did rule that the Directive prohibits systems of automatic exclusion from procedures for the award of contracts, but the automatic exclusion procedure rejected by the Court is a procedure carried out without any oral verification procedure, not a procedure based on an irregularity threshold using mathematical criteria.

39. In view of the foregoing I propose that the Court of Justice should answer the second question put by the Consiglio di Stato stating that Article 30(4) does not exclude a mathematical mechanism for setting an irregularity threshold such as to prevent tenderers from ascertaining that threshold before submitting tenders.

4. Explanation of the price tendered

A. Explanations which must be submitted with the tender

40. It can be seen from the principles to which selection in public contracts must conform, and which I have outlined above simply in descriptive terms, that there is nothing in the Directive in general nor in Article 30(4) which specifically prohibits a requirement, under threat of exclusion from the tender procedure, that the tender should be accompanied by an explanation of at least 75% of the price specified in the tender conditions. This constitutes an objective requirement which all applicants must satisfy.

41. The Directive does not require those wishing to be awarded a contract to indicate in advance the component parts and the contents of their tender, but there is nothing to prevent such a condition. A provision of this kind does not breach the principle of equality of conditions for those participating in the application procedure. Without exception, all of them must attach explanations on the biggest constituent elements of the price, equivalent to 75% of the figure specified in the tender conditions and enclose, in a separate, sealed envelope, the documents needed to verify the data on which the explanations are based.

42. In this way, therefore, the selection procedure is speeded up and efficiency increased which, as I said earlier, is also a requirement deriving from Community law on public contracts. In the course of the procedure described above, when a bid is considered abnormally low, the awarding authority can proceed, without further delay, to verification of the details and assessment of the explanations submitted, without having to wait for the tenderer to produce them; the tenderer may provide further explanations at the hearing which must take place before the tender is rejected.

In fact, it may happen that on viewing the documentation submitted alongside the tender and the clarifications provided at that point, the awarding authority decides to admit the tender. The procedure for awarding the contract can be continued without the delay that would arise if no explanatory documentation had been submitted ab initio and it was necessary to hear the applicant in order for an explanation to be provided.

43. I therefore propose that the Court should answer the first question referred by the Consiglio di Stato stating that a provision in the contract notice according to which undertakings which have not submitted with their tenders explanations in respect of the price indicated, being equal to at least 75% of the figure specified in the tender conditions, does not represent an obstacle to the application of Article 30(4) of the Directive.

B. Nature of the explanations

44. The second indent of Article 30(4) provides that, to assess abnormally low tenders, the awarding authority may take into consideration explanations regarding the economy of the construction method or the technical solution chosen or the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer for the execution of the work or the originality of the work proposed by the tenderer.

45. The second indent does no more than enlarge upon the first indent of paragraph 4, according to which the awarding authority shall request from the tenderer details it considers relevant and, taking account of the explanations received, shall verify the constituent elements of the tender.

46. It appears from a joint interpretation of both indents that, before rejecting a tender by reason of the fact that it is abnormally low, the awarding authority must ask the applicant for any details and explanations it considers relevant. In response to this request, and to support his proposal, the tenderer must submit explanations he considers relevant, without any limitation, including those mentioned in the second indent.

All the explanations must be taken into consideration by the awarding authority when it makes its final decision on whether to accept or reject the tender, including the explanations outlined in the second indent. This provision is not a block rule, and does not set out a restrictive list of reasons and explanations which may be submitted, but, on the contrary, simply explains the general rules in the first indent.

47. Consequently, a provision limiting the category of explanations which the applicant in an abnormally low tender may provide to those categories listed in the second indent of Article 30(4) would be incompatible with the letter and the spirit of the Directive whose intention is that, before rejecting a tender because it is excessively low, the tenderer may provide explanations without any limitation. This rule, furthermore, is contained in Article 7 of Italian Law 216/1995.

48. An applicant submitting a tender which exceeds the irregularity threshold must have the opportunity to put forward his arguments and, in order to support the worth of his proposal, to present any explanations he considers relevant. However, it is possible to provide clarifications only if the tenderer has sufficient flexibility, in a situation of free competition, to provide lower prices than his competitors and, thus, to put forward plans for the most advantageous contract in the general interest. Therefore, where there is no such flexibility, any explanation is redundant.

49. In principle, this would be the case if prices were officially fixed. Where prices are controlled, no explanation is necessary, as such explanation is provided by the rules. If a tenderer has put forward different prices in that instance, the proposal cannot be justified. In that case, exclusion of the explanations would not be incompatible with the Directive.

50. In my view, however, the above does not take account of two key ideas: one, that controlled prices are not synonymous with immutable prices, and the other, that the purpose of the Directive is to facilitate free competition between contractors.

51. Nothing can prevent an undertaking from offering a different price - a lower price - than that indicated as the minimum in official lists for particular elements of the work. A proposal made by a tenderer is complex in its content, it is not monolithic, which means the various elements can be combined to reach a price and conditions of execution which make it the most attractive option in the general interest. To deprive a person wishing to be awarded a contract of the possibility of justifying the reasons why a lower price is being offered than that set in official lists means ruling out the beneficial effects deriving from fair competition and condemning the tenderer to automatic exclusion of his tender.

52. In view of the foregoing I propose that the Court should answer the fourth and fifth question put by the Consiglio di Stato by stating that Article 30(4) of the Directive prohibits a national law requiring the awarding authority, as part of its verification of abnormally low tenders, to take into consideration only particular explanations and to exclude those explanations referring to elements whose minimum values can be found on official lists.

5. Oral procedure for verification of tenders

53. In this Opinion I have repeatedly stated in different contexts that Article 30(4) of the Directive prohibits the automatic exclusion of tenders considered to be abnormally low. Before adopting a decision to exclude, the awarding authority must request, in writing, details of the constituent elements of the tender which it considers relevant. It was the intention of the Community legislature that no tender should be rejected without the applicant being able to provide ample explanation. The oral verification procedure is obligatory as the Court ruled in Transporoute, Fratelli Costanzo and Donà Alfonso.

54. Due hearing of the parties is synonymous with dialogue, discussion and debate. The picture is one-sided only when the party affected by the decision may not provide explanations. This is what happens in the system under Italian law in which the decision to exclude is adopted taking account only of explanations submitted at the same time as the tender, without the awarding authority being in a position to request clarification and without giving the tenderer concerned the possibility of supplementing the explanations provided at the outset.

55. Where a tender is considered abnormally low, after opening the envelope containing the documents with the supporting information for the explanations submitted at the outset, and before deciding on the outcome, the awarding authority is required to request any explanations it considers relevant. Taking into account the latter explanations, as well as those submitted initially and the supporting documents, it must make its decision on whether to exclude the tender or accept it.

56. To summarise, in response to the third question for preliminary ruling, any procedure of excluding abnormally low tenders where the applicant undertakings do not have the opportunity to provide explanations after the envelopes are opened, and before the decision to exclude is made, is in conflict with Article 30(4) of the Directive.

VII - Conclusion

57. On the basis of the foregoing I propose the following answers by the Court of Justice to the questions referred by the Consiglio di Stato della Repubblica Italiana of the Italian Republic with reference to Article 30(4) of the Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts:

(a) A mechanism for automatically identifying tenders which overstep a threshold indicative of irregularities which is such that undertakings are unable to ascertain that threshold in advance before submitting their tenders is not in conflict with Article 30(4) of the Directive;

(b) Article 30(4) of the Directive does not prohibit the call for tender containing a clause excluding undertakings who do not submit with their tenders explanations in respect of the price indicated, being equal to at least 75% of the figure specified in the tender conditions;

(c) Article 30(4) of the Directive prohibits a national law from requiring an awarding authority to verify abnormally low tenders by taking into account only certain explanations and from excluding those tenders referring to items for which minimum figures can be inferred from official lists; and

(d) Article 30(4) of the Directive does not permit an exclusion procedure for abnormally low tenders where the tenderers do not have the chance to provide explanations following the opening of the envelopes and before the adoption of the decision to exclude.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Mischo delivered on 19 October 2000.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure by a Member State to fulfil obligations - Directive 93/37/EEC - Public works contracts - Concept of 'contracting authority'.
Case C-237/99.

1 Upon reading two French publications, the Bulletin officiel des annonces des marchés publics and the Moniteur des travaux publics et du bâtiment, the Commission found that three public works contract notices, two published by offices publics d'aménagement et de construction (public development and construction entities, or `OPACs'), and one by a société anonyme d'habitation à loyer modéré (low-rent housing corporation), or `SA HLM', had not been published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, S series. The Commission takes the view that Article 11 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (`the Directive') (1) required that those notices be published in the S series, having regard to both the value of the contracts and the nature of the awarding body.

2 In the Commission's view, both OPACs and SA HLMs are to be regarded as contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive.

3 The Commission was not satisfied with the French Republic's reply to the formal notice addressed to it. After having found, as it maintains, numerous other contracts awarded by bodies of the same type, notice of which had not been published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, so that the practice appeared to be persistent, the Commission issued a reasoned opinion. Finally, still not satisfied by the explanations of the French authorities, the Commission brought the action with which I am here concerned.

4 It should, however, be noted at the outset that the scope of the dispute has changed in the course of the written procedure.

5 The French Republic has accepted from the time of filing its defence that in the light of the Court's case-law, in particular the judgments of 15 January 1998 (2) and 10 November 1998 (3), OPACs are contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive, thereby acknowledging that such bodies are required to publish notices of contracts in the Official Journal of the European Communities, S series. In so far as concerns the OPACs, the Court can thus only declare that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations.

6 The dispute has also narrowed in respect of SA HLMs, inasmuch as the parties, whilst still in disagreement as to whether such bodies are to be regarded as contracting authorities for the purposes of the Directive, have established in the course of their written pleadings that their positions differ on only one very specific issue, the answer to which will determine the outcome of the dispute: namely whether the supervision which the public authorities exercise over SA HLMs corresponds exactly to the type of supervision referred to in the Directive when it sets out the criteria by which contracting authorities may be identified.

7 The Court has become familiar with the Directive, which it has interpreted in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and BFI Holding, cited above. For that reason I do not consider that there is any need to decide the context in which it was adopted, its objectives and its general structure. I turn directly to Article 1, which, by means of a series of definitions, defines the scope of the Directive. Article 1 provides

(a) "public works contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority;

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law [or] associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

A "body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

The lists of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph are set out in Annex I. These lists shall be as exhaustive as possible and may be reviewed in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 35. To this end, Member States shall periodically notify the Commission of any changes of their lists of bodies and categories of bodies;

8 In its application, the Commission sets out to demonstrate, relying principally on the Code de la construction et de l'habitation (Construction and Housing Code, hereafter `the Code') published by the Journal officiel de la République française, that SA HLMs are to be regarded as public bodies and therefore as contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive.

9 To this end, it points out, first, that the bodies in question were set up for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, namely to provide housing for persons and families of modest means, and that they have legal personality, so that the first two conditions of Article 1(b) necessary to meet the definition of a body governed by public law are fulfilled.

10 Turning to the third condition, the Commission points out, without being contradicted on that point, that of the three characteristics referred to in the Directive, namely that the body in question is financed for the most part by the public authorities, that it is subject to management supervision by the latter and that more than half of the members of the governing board are appointed by the public authorities, only one need be satisfied in order for a body to be deemed to fulfil that condition.

11 The Commission contends that a number of provisions of the Code, to which I shall in due course be turning my attention, make it clear that the supervision exercised by the State over SA HLMs matches precisely that which the Community legislature had in mind.

12 In its defence, the French Republic sets out to demonstrate that the supervision to which these corporations are subject does not in any way correspond to that referred to in the Directive. The various types of supervision described by the Commission do not allow the public authorities to intervene in decisions concerning the proper functioning of SA HLMs. Such supervision is of an administrative nature, and must be distinguished from the management or investment controls with which, in its view, Article 1(b) is concerned.

13 In its reply, the Commission maintains that the distinction is irrelevant. It maintains that there is nothing in Article 1(b) to support the conclusion that only supervision which gives the public authorities power to intervene in the day-to-day management of the corporation is caught by that provision.

14 In its rejoinder, the French Republic, still arguing on the premiss that for there to be management supervision within the meaning of Article 1(b) there must be supervision involving an evaluation of the way in which funds are administered, endeavours to show that the various types of supervision highlighted by the Commission are administrative in nature and exclude any involvement with management.

15 In its statement in intervention, the United Kingdom supports the interpretation of the Directive on which the French Republic bases its defence.

16 It is therefore quite clear that the point at issue between the parties is when the management of a body is to be regarded as subject to supervision by another.

17 To my mind, the outcome depends not only on the meaning to be given to the term `supervision' but also on what is to be understood by `management', even if it is the interpretation of `supervision' which is the bone of contention.

18 I shall therefore consider each of these terms in turn.

What is management? What is supervision?

19 According to the dictionary Le Petit Robert, the term gestion (management), which describes the action of managing, is allied to administration, leadership and organisation, all of which connote the exercise of some form of power.

20 That inclines me to the view that supervision not linked to the way in which those who hold power in a body influence its activities cannot be described as management supervision of that body.

21 That interpretation of gestion does not conflict with the terms gestion, (4) gestione (5) and gestao (6) used in the Spanish, Italian and Portuguese versions of the Directive respectively, or with the term diakhirísi used in the Greek version. (7)

22 It is even supported by the use of the terms Leitung (8) and `management' (9) in the German and English versions, and by the joint use in Dutch of activiteiten and beheer. (10)

23 In the Danish version there is no equivalent of the term `management'. Reference is made solely to kontrol (11).

24 As for the term `supervision', semantic analysis unfortunately provides no means of deciding between the two opposing interpretations put forward by the Commission, on the one hand, and the French Republic and the United Kingdom, on the other.

25 Reference to Le Petit Robert shows that contrôle denotes a relationship of supervision and verification as much as one of domination and leadership.

26 Admittedly, the first meaning is stated there to have the advantage of long usage and the second to have emerged only in the twentieth century, so that the French term `contrôle' acquired the same meaning as the English word `control'. However, that semantic development certainly does not make it possible to determine without hesitation the meaning of `supervision' which the Community legislature had in mind in 1993.

27 Still on the semantic level, when describing a situation in which `supervision' means `domination', one speaks of an undertaking which controls another, and not of an undertaking which exercises supervision over another, but the opposite is not true, since the fact of being subject to supervision does not necessarily imply the existence of a power to intervene in decision-making.

28 Since it is impossible to find a solution by analysing the French version of the Directive, upon which the Commission and the French Government base their reasoning, the rules of interpretation laid down by the Court require us to turn to the other linguistic versions.

29 The Spanish, Italian and Portuguese versions, which employ the terms control, controllo and controlo respectively, and the Greek version, which uses the term elenkho, are no more helpful than the French version.

30 At first sight, the use in the German version of the term Aufsicht, used in everyday language to mean `surveillance', where the French version uses contrôle, might give the impression that the Community legislature did not specifically intend `supervision' to imply a power of intervention.

31 It seems to me however to be difficult to draw definite conclusions from the use of the term Aufsicht, in so far as in German, in order to refer to the supervisory board of a company, that is to say the body which, together with the managerial board, holds power when the company does not follow the classic model of having a board of directors, the term used is Aufsichtsrat. In a company whose administration is structured along those lines, the Aufsichtsrat is by no means a mere supervisor of the managerial board, but is actively involved in the management of the company, since it participates in defining the company's objectives and determining its strategy.

32 The term toezicht in the Dutch version calls for the same observations, mutatis mutandis, as does Aufsicht in the German version.

33 The English version of the Directive sheds no more light on the topic, because `management supervision' conveys nothing of the scope of the powers of the supervising authority, whether simple surveillance of management or the possibility of intervening in management decisions.

34 Having concluded this rapid foray into the linguistic pluralism peculiar to Community law, what conclusion may we draw?

35 Certainly not any definite conclusion as to the type of supervision envisaged by the Community legislature, with which the supervision to which SA HLMs are subject might be compared.

36 To my mind, however, the exercise has not been fruitless since it has at least shown that it would not be contrary to the wording of the Directive to consider that control involving the exercise of supervision of the way in which the body in question is run, without involvement in its running, is enough for that body to be regarded as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive.

37 The next step will therefore be to analyse the Court's case-law, not in the hope of finding a definition of supervision for the purposes of Article 1(b), since if such a definition existed the parties would clearly have referred to it and I should immediately have used it as the corner-stone of my reasoning, but in order to seek any factors which may clarify the approach to be adopted in identifying bodies governed by public law falling within the scope of the Directive.

38 The only judgment to date to deal with the problem of the meaning of `body governed by public law' for the purposes of Directive 93/37 is Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others, cited above. (12)

39 It is true that the same concept, which also appears in Article 1(b) of another directive in the field of public procurement, Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, (13) was also considered in BFI Holding, cited above. The Court held in that judgment that, `with a view to giving full effect to the principle of freedom of movement, the term "contracting authority" must be interpreted in functional terms (see, to that effect, Case 31/87 Beentjes v Netherlands State [1988] ECR 4635, paragraph 11). In view of that need, no distinction should be drawn by reference to the legal form of the provisions setting up the entity and specifying the needs which it is to meet' (paragraph 62). Essentially, however, that judgment is concerned with the definition of a body established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character. I shall therefore concentrate on Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others.

40 To my mind, and contrary to what the Commission suggests, the relevance of that decision to the present case does not lie in the following statements made by the Court at paragraph 28 to show that the third condition was thereby fulfilled:

- the Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei (Austrian State Printer, hereafter the OS) was established specifically for the purpose of meeting needs in the public interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, namely for the production of administrative documents subject in varying degrees to security measures, and has legal personality;

- the Director-General of the OS is appointed by a body consisting mainly of members appointed by the Federal Chancellery or various ministries;

- furthermore, it is subject to scrutiny by the Court of Auditors and a State control service is responsible for monitoring the printed matter which is subject to security measures;

- finally, according to the statements made at the hearing by SRG, the majority of the shares in the OS are still held by the Austrian State.

41 This is because the finding as regards the appointment of the managing board was sufficient, in itself, to satisfy the third condition. Consequently, the finding as to supervision exercised by the Court of Auditors and by a State control body, which the Court took care to put after the phrase `furthermore', does not enable one to draw any conclusions as to the degree of supervision considered sufficient by the Court for the purposes of this condition.

42 To draw such conclusions in this case would be all the more hazardous in view of the fact, noted by Advocate General Léger in his Opinion in that case, that the definition of Austrian bodies coming within the scope of the Directive in Annex I, XI, E.1(b) of the Act of Accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden and the amendments to the Treaties founding the European Union (14) brought in the factor of budgetary supervision by the Court of Auditors.

43 What the Court said in respect of the supervision exercised over the OS therefore comes down, in one sense, to stating that the latter is clearly subject to supervision accepted by the Republic of Austria, at the time of its accession, as being such as to meet the criterion of supervision by the public authorities within the meaning of the Directive.

44 The real relevance of Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others for the issue here lies in the résumé of the conditions to be met for there to be a body governed by public law, highlighted in the process of establishing that those conditions were met in the case of the OS.

45 At paragraph 20 it reads:

`Under the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37, a body governed by public law means a body established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, which has legal personality and is closely dependent on the State (15), regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law.'

46 It will be observed straightaway that whilst the Court states the first two conditions in terms borrowed directly from the Directive it presents the third, without pausing to consider the three alternative criteria which must be applied, as referring to a certain type of relationship with the public authorities, namely close dependence. We may thus conclude that the three criteria for the third condition in Article 1(b) of the Directive constitute three alternative means of establishing the same fact, namely a situation of close dependence on the public authorities.

47 Since they are alternatives which enable the establishment of the same fact, these criteria may be regarded as equally sensitive tests. It cannot be the case that one of them can be read in such a way as to bring within the category of bodies governed by public law, bodies in a situation of dependence on the public authorities which differs markedly from that of bodies placed in the same category by one or other of the other two criteria.

48 In practice, this means that only bodies whose dependence on the public authorities is as close as that which arises from being financed, for the most part, by public authorities, or from the appointment of more than half of the members of the management board by the same public authorities, may be regarded as bodies governed by public law by reason of the supervision exercised over their management.

49 This pragmatic approach adopted by the Court does not, admittedly, enable us to decide between the two positions of principle advanced by the Commission, on the one hand, and the French Republic, on the other - that is, whether mere surveillance of management is sufficient or whether it is necessary to establish the existence of supervision entailing the power to intervene in management. In fact, it goes further, and transcends, so to speak, the conflict, inviting us to focus not so much on the nature of the supervision exercised as on the particular situation to which the existence of this supervision gives rise. That approach is, I think, in perfect harmony with the aims of the Community provisions on public procurement as stated by Advocate General Léger in paragraph 47 of his Opinion in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others:

`The Community public procurement legislation was developed to ensure, at Community level, respect for the principles of free competition, freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, which had long been [undermined] by the widespread tendency to act in that way. Its purpose is to ensure that traders, of whatever origin, have equal access to contracts put out to tender by public authorities for the execution of their projects, whatever form those authorities may take.'

50 In a footnote the Advocate General referred to Beentjes, cited above. Subsequently, the Court has made it clear, in paragraph 62 of BFI Holding, and paragraph 36 of Commission v Ireland that not only the meaning of `State' but also that of `contracting authority' must be given a functional interpretation.

51 In applying this approach of the Court one has to ask, not whether each of the controls weighing on the SA HLMs and pointed to by the Commission, taken separately, is such as to put those companies in a situation of dependence on the public authorities, but whether, having regard to the legislative and regulatory framework within which the SA HLMs operate, the various controls to which they are subject in fact give rise to close dependence on the public authorities. This is because it is apparent that the same type of supervision may give rise to different conclusions according to the context in which it applies. One type may give rise to different effects according to whether, by operation of the provisions which govern its application, the body subject to it enjoys considerable freedom of management or, on the contrary, the provisions strictly define its activity and determine the direction of management in advance.

52 For this reason I consider it necessary now to consider the status of SA HLMs and the legal context within which they operate.

The legal framework within which SA HLMs operate

53 SA HLMs are commercial companies and are therefore governed by the 1966 law on companies. They are, however, a specific type because their inclusion, by Article L. 411-2 of the Code, in the list of low-cost housing bodies has the effect of making them subject to a host of rules laid down by the Code. Some of these rules apply to all low-cost housing bodies, including in particular public ones and OPACs, whilst others apply specifically to SA HLMs.

54 Thus, under Article L. 422-2 of the Code their object is to perform, in the conditions determined by their statutes, principally with a view to leasing, the activities laid down by Article L. 411-1, which defines those activities in the following terms:

`The provisions of this chapter set out the rules applicable to the construction, purchase, development, rehabilitation, repair and management of individual or collective, urban or rural housing, meeting the technical characteristics and the cost price determined by administrative decision and intended to meet the needs of individuals or families of limited means...'.

55 It will be noted not only that the type of client to which SA HLMs offer their services is fixed by law, but that the technical characteristics and the cost price of the housing they may deal with is set by administrative decision.

56 When an SA HLM is constituted its statutes must comply with the model statutes annexed to Article R. 422-1 of the Code. These are extremely detailed. One finds there, as to the objects of the company, a distinction between the primary object, the letting of housing at a rent fixed in accordance with the rules laid down by the Code, and the construction of such housing, and the secondary object, for which 17 types of activity are listed, each precisely defined.

57 The model statutes specify that the transfer of shares must take place at a price not exceeding a maximum, the means of calculation of which is specified, and that such transfer, unless it occurs within a family context, requires the consent of the board of directors or supervisory board, which need not disclose the reasons for its consent or refusal.

58 Members of the board of directors or supervisory board of an SA HLM serve without remuneration, save that a fixed allowance calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Code may be given to members who are in paid employment.

59 If a profit is made, the dividend payable may not exceed a fixed maximum.

60 According to paragraph 11 of the model statutes:

`In the month after that in which the company meets in ordinary general meeting in accordance with Article 157 of the Law of 24 July 1966 cited above, the company shall file its accounts and reports to shareholders, together with the minutes of the general meeting, with the representative of the State in the département where its head office is situated, at the Deposit and Consignment Office, and with the Minister of Housing.

Where the shareholders' meeting is postponed, the judicial decision granting an extension of time must be similarly filed.'

61 Adopting the model statutes is not sufficient, however, to enable an SA HLM to commence business because Article L. 422-5 of the Code requires approval to be given, by means of administrative decision, to be issued in accordance with Article R. 422-16 by the Minister for Housing and Construction, on advice from the housing committee of the département, and the regulatory body for low-cost housing.

62 It will be noted that the previous version of the model statutes, (16) annexed in error to the Commission's application, provided for a government commissioner, whose powers were defined as follows:

`When the company receives approval in accordance with Article R. 422-4 of the Code de la construction et de l'habitation, a government commissioner, appointed by decision of the Minister of Housing, shall have full powers of documentary and on-site investigation.

He shall be entitled to sit in on meetings of the board of directors, in an advisory capacity, and may, where necessary, call such a meeting. He shall receive, on the same terms as the members of the board of directors, notice of such meetings, agendas and any other documents prior to each meeting. He shall further be entitled to copies of the minutes of each meetings and of the decisions taken by the board.

He may also order, within 15 days of the date of adoption, a re-examination of all or part of any decision of the board of directors. This examination must take place within 15 days. Action on the decision in question shall be suspended pending the re-examination.

He shall file with the Minister for Housing an annual report on the activity of the company.

Remuneration of the government commissioner, which shall be borne by the company, shall be set by the decision appointing him in accordance with a scale fixed by interministerial decision.'

63 If that provision had not been revoked in 1993, even interpreting management supervision as including a power of intervention, as advocated by the French Republic and the United Kingdom, would lead to the conclusion that SA HLMs are public bodies within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive.

64 However, the other provisions which I have just set out, and which their statutes must include, indicate that SA HLMs are very tightly constrained, in terms of both the activities which they may pursue and the means of pursuing them and the deployment of capital, and that the profile of a shareholder in such a company is clearly very different from that of a company which is governed only by the 1966 law.

65 This framework should not, of course, be confused with the supervision to which Article 1(b) of the Directive refers. The existence of rules, no matter how precise, which a body must observe is one thing, supervision over the management of that body is another. This follows from the fact that if monitoring compliance with such rules and sanctions for their breach could only be a matter for the courts one could not speak of supervision by the State, a public body or a body governed by public law.

66 Nonetheless this very strict framework cannot be ignored when it comes to considering whether SA HLMs are in a situation of close dependence on the public authorities.

67 This follows from the fact that if the rules of management are very detailed, the simple supervision of their observance will inevitably result in a degree of control by the public authorities which is hardly distinguishable from that arising from appointment by the latter of the majority of the members of the management body or from finance which is for the most part public, in the sense that management will be guided by the public authorities and supervision will be merely a means of furthering the domination provided for in the framework rules.

68 In other words, and to come back to the approach laid down in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others, where there is a strict regulatory framework the type of supervision envisaged by the Commission in its interpretation of Article 1(b) of the Directive will, from the point of view of close dependence on the public authorities, have the same effect as would arise, in the absence of such a framework, from the type of supervision envisaged by the French Republic in its interpretation of that article.

The controls in question

69 I turn now to consider whether the different controls identified by the Commission are such as to place the SA HLMs in a situation of close dependence on the public authorities.

70 The first provision of the Code cited by the Commission to show that SA HLMs are subject to management supervision by the public authorities is Article L. 422-7. This provides as follows:

`In case of serious irregularity or serious fault of management or failure on the part of the board of directors or supervisory board of a low-cost housing company or crédit immobilier company, the Minister of Housing and Construction may, after hearing the company, or the latter having had the opportunity to be heard, order the winding up of the company and the appointment of a liquidator.'

71 This provision leads me to make three observations.

72 Firstly, I do not think that one can argue that the three situations envisaged all concern defects in accounting procedures, misappropriation of funds or corruption. These instances fall within the category of `serious irregularity'.

73 On the other hand, `serious fault of management' can only refer to decisions taken ill-advisedly by the body, such as non-observance of the company's objectives, or careless financial decisions.

74 Lastly, the question of `failure' refers to wrongful abstention from action or a general lack of activity.

75 Clearly the last two categories fall within management policy and not supervision of compliance with the rules.

76 Secondly, I fail to see how the Minister responsible for Housing and Construction (hereafter `the Minister') could find a `serious fault of management' or a `failure' without exercising management supervision, at least at regular intervals. This supervision is rendered possible by the obligation imposed on the company to file with the Minister, amongst others, its accounts and, above all, its reports to shareholders (see paragraph 11 of the model statutes, mentioned above).

77 Thirdly, it is undeniable that the powers conferred on the Minister by this article are far-reaching, since they allow the former to order the winding up of an SA HLM if it appears to him that its management is seriously wanting.

78 The following provision, Article L. 422-8, (17) also cited by the Commission, gives the Minister power to take action less drastic than winding up, namely to suspend the management bodies, but this comes with extensive powers over the management of the company, which can be placed in the hands of an interim administrator appointed by the Minister.

79 It is thus no longer even a question of being involved in management, but of the transfer of management powers to a person appointed by the public authorities.

80 Furthermore, the intervention of this person does not result in a return to the status quo ante, since the company must undergo a period of intensive supervision for two years. (18)

81 Still within the legislative ambit of the Code, the Commission refers to Articles L. 423-1 and L. 423-2, (19) which empower the Minister both to order the liquidation of an SA HLM whose activity falls below a minimum threshold and to order the transfer of a part of its estate to another low-cost housing body where its activity exceeds a certain upper limit.

82 Such measures undeniably enable the Minister to exercise a certain degree of management or, at least, either to inject a minimum of dynamism into the management or to prevent SA HLMs from becoming real property empires.

83 As the Commission points out, the Code does not confine ministerial intervention to remedying serious faults or deficiencies in management, or to ensuring compliance with the constraints within which SA HLMs must operate. Rather it establishes as a general principle, by Article L. 451-1, of `administrative supervision' of low-cost housing bodies, and therefore of SA HLMs. Article R. 451-1 states that all low-cost housing bodies, regardless of their legal form and method of finance, `are subject to the supervision of the Ministers of Finance and of Housing and Construction'. To ensure the effectiveness of this supervision, Article L. 451-2 (20) grants a power of scrutiny over documents held by architects and contractors who have dealt with low-cost housing bodies, with refusal to comply on the part of the latter punishable by heavy fines.

84 It will be noted that Article L. 451-1 in no way limits the extent of the supervision which the public authorities may exercise over SA HLMs, for example by stating that this is simply supervision of their compliance with the rules.

85 In fact the public authorities have at their disposal, in addition to the measures described above, a whole range of powers enabling them to direct the management of SA HLMs. The Commission cites two examples.

86 Firstly, Article R. 423-72 of the Code, which makes a decision manifestly concerning company management, namely the revaluation of assets, to the prior agreement of the Minister.

87 Secondly, Decree No 93-236 of 22 February 1993, on the establishment of an interministerial committee for the inspection of public housing. Article 3 of the decree states:

`The purpose of the committee is the supervision of legal or natural persons operating in the field of public housing.

The committee shall supervise the construction, acquisition and improvement of public housing carried out with financing subsidised or regulated by the State, or the subject of an agreement with the State, or backed by tax-exempt funding.

The committee may be empowered by the Ministers to whom it reports to carry out supervisory work and surveys, in addition to studies, audits and evaluations in the field of public housing.

The committee shall formulate proposals concerning the action to be taken in respect of its inspection reports and to ensure the implementation by the supervised bodies of the measures taken by the Ministers to whom it reports.

The committee shall, upon request, provide assistance to the decentralised services of the Ministers of the Economy, of Finance, of the Budget and of Industry.'

88 Plainly, this body is not a mere observer. It may put forward to the Minister proposals concerning the management of the various low-cost housing bodies and, if the Minister adopts them, it is responsible for their implementation.

89 The French Republic does not, of course, dispute the existence of these various forms of supervision.

90 In response to the various forms of intervention by the Minister identified by the Commission, the French Republic points to the fact that they are confined to strictly defined situations which occur only very rarely in practice.

91 As to the general power of supervision vested in the Minister, the French Republic contends that:

`It should be stressed that these are exceptional powers which may only be exercised in limited circumstances. They consist of a power to verify the accounting procedures of the bodies. Government officials can call for evidence of funds or securities, and can inspect all documents. They can call for any information, subject only to the requirement that they do not interfere in operations. The end result of this supervision is a report in which the government inspectors confine themselves to recording misuse or misappropriation of funds to the Minister. In sum, this programme of inspection constitutes more a persistent threat hanging over the bodies concerned than management supervision in the strict sense, that is, in terms of decisions involving strategic or investment choices.'

92 I consider, however, that I have shown, in relation to Article L. 422-7 of the Code and the model statutes with which SA HLMs must comply, that the supervision of them exercised by the public authorities is wider than that, embracing as it does all documents available to the general meeting and the reports of the latter.

93 As to the interministerial committee for the inspection of public housing [MILOS], the French Republic submits in its rejoinder that:

`... the MILOS is not in a position to give orders or instructions to the bodies which it supervises. The inspections result, after the body concerned has been heard, in a report incorporating the observations of the body as to the strengths and weaknesses brought to light as a result of the inspection, and may include proposals or recommendations addressed as much to the body itself as to the supervisory power. The report is then forwarded, as well as to the managing director of the supervised entity, to the local supervisory bodies (the Prefect and the Departmental Paymaster) and the national supervisory bodies (the Ministers of Finance and Housing respectively). By its nature, and in view of those to whom it is addressed, a MILOS report has the status of an act of administrative supervision with a diagnostic and advisory purpose. If the managing committee of the MILOS or its permanent commission oversees the action to be taken in the light of these observations, the MILOS does no more than make recommendations on a case by case basis resulting in negotiations with the body itself to cause it to move forward, particularly if its financial status becomes critical.'

94 Even there, however, the argument does not seem to me to be well founded, because these inspections are in addition to the other supervisory measures already described. It is interesting to note, however, that according to the French Republic itself, the said committee can enter into negotiations with the supervised body `to cause it to move forward'.

95 In my opinion, if the approach laid down in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others is adopted one can only agree with the Commission, since everything leads to the conclusion that in fact SA HLMs are, by reason of the supervision which the public authorities exercise over their management, in a situation of close dependence on the public authorities.

96 There is one final matter which arises from the way in which the Commission arrives at a finding of a failure to fulfil obligations. In its application, it asks the Court to declare that the French Republic has, in making various awards of public contracts concerning the construction of housing by OPACs and SA HLMs, failed to fulfil its obligations under Directive 93/37, and in particular under Article 11(2) thereof. In my opinion it is difficult to find for the Commission on these terms.

97 As the Commission has not asked the Court to declare that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directive 93/37 by reason of a failure to take the necessary steps to ensure that OPACs and SA HLMs publish in the Official Journal of the European Communities, S series, notice of contracts the value of which exceeds the threshold laid down by the Directive, which would have presented no difficulty, given that it is this point which has been at issue throughout the proceedings, it seems to me that the Court ought to confine itself to declaring a failure to fulfil obligations in the three concrete cases referred to by the Commission.

Conclusion

98 In the light of the foregoing, I suggest that the Court:

- declare that, by failing to adopt the necessary measures to ensure that the Office public d'aménagement et de construction for the Val-de-Marne, the Logirel Société anonyme d'habitation à loyer modéré

The role of the interim administrator ends either on the appointment of a new board of directors or supervisory board by the company in general meeting at the latest within one year, extendable once from the date of the ministerial decision, or, in the absence of such appointment, on the appointment of a liquidator by the Minister for Housing and Construction.

Within two years of the appointment of the interim administrator, he must be invited to and may attend all meetings of the board of directors or of the new supervisory board, and general shareholders'

If in the course of this period he determines that the necessary measures for the recovery of the company have not been adopted or implemented, he shall inform the Minister of Housing and Construction. The latter may, together with the Minister of the Economy and Finance, after having heard the company, either proceed to the winding up and liquidation of the body in question, or further suspend the board of directors or the supervisory board and appoint an interim administrator for a fixed term. This administrator must, before the expiry of his term, call a general meeting to appoint a new board of directors or supervisory board, failing which he will proceed to the winding up and liquidation of the body.

(18) - The Commission could also have referred to Article L. 422-6, which provides for the power to suspend individual members of the management bodies, and to Article L. 422-9, which provides that:

`Where a low-cost housing or crédit immobilier company fails to file the administrative and accounting documents listed by decree provided for by Article L. 423-3 with the relevant administrative authority for two years, or if it is unable to appoint a board of directors, or to call a general shareholders' meeting, the administrative authority may order its winding up and appoint a liquidator, on terms provided for by decree, either upon application of the members holding the majority of the capital, or upon application of a representative of the State in the département, or on its own initiative.'

(19) - Article L. 423-1:

`Any low-cost housing entity which manages less than 1 500 properties and which has built fewer than 500 properties or granted fewer than 300 loans in ten years may be wound up and a liquidator appointed by decision of the Minister of Housing and Construction and, in the case of public low-cost housing and construction bodies, by joint decision of the said Minister and the Minister for the Home Office.

Any low-cost housing body managing more than 50 000 properties may be called on, by decision of the Minister of Housing and Construction, to transfer all or some of the properties exceeding this number to one or more designated bodies.'

(20) - The government officials responsible for implementing the supervision provided for by the preceding article may, for the purposes of that implementation only, consult any accounts, correspondence, receipts or records of expenditure in the offices of architects and contractors who have dealt with bodies subject to this supervision.

Any refusal to enter into communication shall render the perpetrator liable to a fine of FRF 60 000.'

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 30 January 2001.
Agorà Srl and Excelsior Snc di Pedrotti Bruna & C. v Ente Autonomo Fiera Internazionale di Milano and Ciftat Soc. coop. arl.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale per la Lombardia - Italy.
Public service contracts - Definition of contracting authorities - Body governed by public law.
Joined cases C-223/99 and C-260/99.

I - Introduction

1. The two references for a preliminary ruling from the Tribunale amministrativo regionale per la Lombardia (Lombardy Regional Administrative Court) (Italy) concern - in connection with procurement procedures conducted by the Milanese fair company Ente Autonomo Fiera Internazionale di Milano (hereinafter the Ente Fiera) - the question of the interpretation of the concept of a body governed by public law within the meaning of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (hereinafter Directive 92/50). In particular, the parties disagree on the requirement of being established... for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character.

II - Legal framework

A - Directive 92/50

2. The relevant provisions of Article 1 of Directive 92/50 state:

For the purposes of this Directive:

(b) contracting authorities shall mean the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law.

Body governed by public law means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

The lists of bodies or of categories of such bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph of this point are set out in Annex I to Directive 71/305/EEC. These lists shall be as exhaustive as possible and may be reviewed in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 30b of that Directive;

B - Italian implementing legislation

3. Directive 92/50 was implemented in Italian law by Decree-Law No 157 of 17 March 1995 (hereinafter Decree-Law No 157/95). The concept of a body governed by public law was adopted from Directive 92/50 in Article 2 of the Decree-Law.

C - Articles of association of the Ente Fiera

4. The Ente Fiera was established in the early part of the 20th century in the form of a committee under private law. Its capital was for the most part provided by private businessmen. By Royal Decree No 919 of 1 July 1922 the Ente Fiera was transformed into a private-law legal person.

5. The Ente Fiera is responsible for the organisation of the international fair in Milan. At the time of the reference for a preliminary ruling, the provisions of its articles of association relevant to these proceedings stated:

Article 1 - Object

1. The objects of the Ente Autonomo Fiera Internazionale di Milano (hereinafter "Ente") having its seat in Milan, Largo Domodossola Nr. 1, established by Royal Decree No 919 of 1 July 1922, declared Ente Fieristico Internazionale by Decree of the President of the Republic No 616 of 24 July 1977, are to carry on and facilitate any activity concerned with the organisation of fairs and conferences and any other initiative which, by fostering trade relations, promotes the presentation of the production of goods and services and if possible their sale. The Ente is a non-profit-making body and carries on activities in the public interest. Its operations are governed by the principles of the Civil Code.

2. Management of the Ente shall be based on the criteria of performance, efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

3. The Ente may effect any operations not prohibited to it by law or its articles of association, including financial operations, loans and the conclusion of commercial guarantees in respect of movable and immovable property in pursuance of its objects; furthermore, it may form companies or bodies whose objects are similar, related or linked to its own, or acquire stakes or shares in such companies or bodies.

Article 3 - Means of pursuing its objects

1. The Ente shall pursue the objects for which it was created using the proceeds arising from carrying on its activities, from administration (including special administration) and management of its assets and from contributions by legal or natural persons.

Under Article 5 of the articles of association, the President of the Ente Fiera is appointed by order of the President of the Republic and the Vice-Presidents and Secretary-General by order of the Minister for Industry (Article 10 of the articles of association).

Under Article 6, more than half of the Consiglio Generale, which is responsible for making the Ente Fiera's fundamental decisions (see Article 7 of the articles of association), are representatives of the central State, of the region of Lombardy, of the province of Milan and of the city of Milan, the other members being representatives of industry and of the employees.

Under Article 15 of the articles of association, the Ente Fiera is subject to the control of the Minister for Industry.

Under Article 16(1), the Minister for Industry can transfer the management of the Ente Fiera to a commissioner if general administration is no longer effective or serious irregularities are discovered. Under Article 16(2) the Minister for Industry can liquidate the Ente Fiera either because its objects can no longer be achieved or on public interest grounds.

III - Facts of the main proceedings

A - Facts of Case C-223/99

6. On 24 December 1997, Agorà srl (hereinafter Agorà) sent an application in accordance with Article 25 of Italian Law No 241 of 7 August 1990 to the Ente Fiera. In it, Agorà requested the Ente Fiera to send it the documents concerning the award of a contract for the hire of fixtures and fittings for reception areas and information points, which had been referred to in an award notification of 2 August 1997.

7. By decision of 5 January 1998, the Ente Fiera refused to send the documents concerned. By way of justification, it stated that it was not a legal person under public law and was therefore not bound by the transparency requirements of the rules on public service contracts.

8. On 23 January 1998, Agorà challenged that decision in the national court. In its decision of 3 March 1998, the latter upheld its claim and held that the Ente Fiera must send Agorà all documents relating to the award procedure.

9. The Ente Fiera appealed against this decision to the Consiglio di Stato (Council of State). In its decision of 8 July 1998, its Sixth Chamber found a flaw affecting the entire proceedings at first instance and accordingly remitted the case to the court referring the question.

10. By a document of 19 October 1998, Agorà applied anew for its claim to be upheld. It argued that a reference to the Court for a preliminary ruling was appropriate in respect of the disputed question on the applicability of the rules on public service contracts.

11. The national court is of the opinion that the obligation which Agorà claims binds the Ente Fiera to observe the transparency requirements under Italian Law No 241 follows from its status as a contracting authority. In this connection it refers to the diverging interpretations of Article 2 of Decree-Law No 157/95 and Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 by the Italian national courts. On the one hand, both the Consiglio di Stato in its judgment No 354 of 21 April 1995, and the referring court in its judgment No 1365 of 17 November 1995, held that the Ente Fiera meets the requirements for the definition of a body governed by public law within the meaning of Directive 92/50. On the other hand, the Consiglio di Stato in its judgment No 1267 of 16 September 1998 reversed the case-law. According to that judgment, the Ente Fiera pursued objects having commercial character and consequently could not be regarded as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Directive 92/50.

12. The Ente Fiera produced the latter decision of the Consiglio di Stato as appendix 3 to its memorandum of 5 November 1999. The Consiglio di Stato based its classification of the Ente Fiera on the fact that the indirect promotion of commerce, which followed from its activity as an organiser of fairs, was not sufficient for a finding of needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character. Though the activity of the Ente Fiera promotes the general interest, in the same way as, for example, banking facilities and telecommunications services are provided in the general interest, the organisation of fairs is an essentially commercial activity connected with the marketing and distribution of goods and services which complements manufacturing by business.

13. Since then, the Corte suprema di cassazione (Supreme Court of Cassation) has confirmed the decision of the Consiglio di Stato in appeal proceedings. The Corte suprema di cassazione also takes the view that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest of an industrial or commercial character. By organising fairs and exhibitions, it promotes the economic and business activities of the exhibitors. Over and above that, it competes with other fair organisers. The fact that the Ente is non-profit-making does not invalidate this classification. The Ente Fiera at least endeavours to cover its costs and any losses it may suffer from its receipts.

B - Facts of Case C-260/99

14. By an announcement published in the Official Journal of the European Communities of 29 July 1997, the Ente Fiera issued a restricted invitation to tender. It concerned the award of cleaning services in respect of its exhibition premises for the period 1 January to 31 December 1998 with the possibility of a two-year extension.

15. Excelsior s.n.c. (hereinafter Excelsior) participated in the procurement procedure for areas 2 to 5. At the end of the procedure, the third area was awarded to Consorzio Miles. The latter was in third place on the award list; the first two applicant firms were rejected by the Ente Fiera. Excelsior was in fifth place on the list.

16. Thereafter, the Ente Fiera cancelled the award of the contract to Miles owing to a serious breach. For the period 13 February to 30 June 1998, the contract was temporarily awarded to C.I.F.T.A.T., which in the earlier procedure had been placed seventh on the list. On 7 March 1998, a new invitation to tender in respect of the area in question was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities for the period 1 July to 31 December 1998, with the possibility of an extension for a further two years.

17. By proceedings instituted on 10 and 11 April 1998, Excelsior challenged both the temporary award of the cleaning services concerned to C.I.F.T.A.T. and the renewed invitation to tender in the Official Journal of 7 March 1998 in respect of the same services before the national court.

18. The Ente Fiera raised as a defence to the action that the courts of administrative jurisdiction had no jurisdiction to decide the questions in issue. It stated as its reason that it was not a body governed by public law and therefore was not bound to observe Community or national rules on the award of public contracts.

19. The national court considers the question whether the Ente Fiera is to be deemed a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 to be decisive in order to determine which court is competent.

IV - Questions referred and proceedings before the Court

20. These are the facts which led the national court to refer the following question, which is the same in both main proceedings, to the Court:

May the definition of a body governed by public law contained in Article 1(b) of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts be deemed applicable to the Ente Autonomo Fiera Internazionale di Milano?

21. By order of the President of 14 September 1999, the two cases C-223/99 and C-260/99 were joined pursuant to Article 43 of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice both for the purposes of the written and oral procedure and for the purposes of judgment.

V - Arguments of the parties

22. The plaintiff in the main proceedings in Case C-223/99, Agorà, submits that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest. This follows both from its articles of association, and from the national legislation, which regulate its tasks and activities. Organising fairs is of general interest and is of use to a group of persons so large that it may be equated to the entirety of the population.

23. Furthermore, the Ente Fiera was also established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest. For this it is enough that the Ente Fiera pursue these interests as an institution. The fact that it was originally established as a committee under private law is irrelevant.

24. Agorà also argues that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character. The industrial or commercial nature of an activity is to be understood as a synonym for a purely private activity on the part of the body concerned. For this it is in turn decisive that it be subject to an obligation to maximise profits.

25. However, under Article 1 of its articles of association, the Ente Fiera's activities are not directed to making profits. Therefore, its decisions cannot be said with certainty to be made solely by reference to economic criteria.

26. Moreover, the State's right of supervision over the Ente Fiera's activities prevent it from operating according to purely economic considerations on the market. The State's control of the organisation of fairs in general means that fair companies are moreover generally liable to be preferred in relation to competitors.

27. Agorà submits that the fact that the Ente Fiera is bound by the provisions of the Civil Code in no way precludes its classification as a body governed by public law.

28. Finally, Agorà submits that the Ente Fiera always observed the Community rules on the award of public contracts until the reversal in the case-law of the Consiglio di Stato in 1998.

29. The plaintiff in the main proceedings in case C-260/99, Excelsior, takes the view that the concept of a body governed by public law must be defined in a manner consistent with the purpose underlying the European public procurement rules. These are intended to prevent the relevant Member State from favouring national companies over companies from other Member States. In order not to undermine that purpose, the concept of a contracting authority, which determines the scope of application of the relevant provisions, is not defined restrictively; instead, the flexible notion of a body governed by public law was introduced.

30. Excelsior argues that it is the needs in the general interest which must not be industrial or commercial, not the body itself. The requirement is, first of all, fulfilled where bodies meet needs in the general interest not related to end-consumers' demand for goods and services. It is likewise fulfilled where bodies meet needs in the general interest that are not specifically for individual benefit and so admit of no discrimination on the basis of price. The Ente Fiera meets needs not having an industrial or commercial character, because it does not provide direct services to individual consumers, but promotes and coordinates the economic activities of third parties. Furthermore, it is not the purpose of the Ente Fiera's activities to make a profit.

31. The Ente Fiera first of all disputes the admissibility of the request for a preliminary ruling in Case C-223/99. The main dispute concerns the applicability of the Italian transparency rules only, not that of the Community rules on public procurement. Whether or not the Ente Fiera is classified as a body governed by public law for the purposes of Directive 92/50 is therefore immaterial to the question in issue in the main proceedings relating to the right of access to public documents.

32. As regards the answer to the question referred, the Ente Fiera advances the view that only one of the requirements for a body governed by public law is indisputably fulfilled, namely the possession of legal personality. On the other hand, it argues that it is not subject to State control. The State's very restricted rights of supervision over the Ente Fiera under national law correspond to those that also exist in respect of foundations and other, exclusively private, economic activities. The State merely has a residual general right of supervision and coordination in respect of the organisation of fairs. Beyond that, the organisation of fairs is entrusted to various bodies under public and private law without State collaboration. Moreover, the Ente Fiera is not subjected to any state audit of its accounts, nor does the State have any financial stake in it.

33. The Ente Fiera carries out activities of an exclusively economic nature. This appears from the fact that it does not operate for free but against payment on the part of the companies that wish to avail themselves of its services. The fact that the activity is not directed at making profits merely means that any surplus is not divided between the shareholders but is reinvested in the Ente Fiera. In this way it is able to finance its activities itself in a cost-effective way. The fact that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest is therefore immaterial because those needs are in any event industrial or commercial in nature.

34. Moreover, the Ente Fiera operates in competition with an ever increasing number of other participants in the market. According to the case-law, this is a further indicator that we are not dealing with a need in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character. Given the competition, if the Ente Fiera did not operate on the basis of economic criteria, its business results would of necessity be negative. But the Ente Fiera's balance sheets show positive financial results.

35. The Commission interpretative communication concerning the application of the Single Market rules to the sector of fairs and exhibitions (hereinafter the Interpretative Communication) too confirms that the organisation of fairs is an economic activity.

36. Finally, the Ente Fiera also points out that no inference as to the general applicability of the Community rules on the award of public contracts may be drawn from the fact that it has voluntarily observed those rules.

37. The Commission in its observations expresses doubts as to whether the Ente Fiera does in fact meet needs in the general interest. Its specific object is to promote the interests of a defined group of persons, namely economic operators. The interests of this admittedly large, but none the less restricted, category can hardly be equated with the general interest.

38. The Commission is of the opinion that, according to its objects, the Ente Fiera pursues purely commercial interests. It follows from Article 1 of its articles of association that the interests that the Ente Fiera is specifically supposed to pursue are inextricably bound up with the presentation and possible sale of the goods or services offered by the economic operators at the fair. The view that the promotion and stimulation of particular economic and production sectors as well as the activity of other economic operators only represents an industrial or commercial interest if it leads to direct satisfaction of individual consumers' demand for goods and services is far too narrow and does not reflect the Directive.

39. Furthermore, the Ente Fiera was also established for the specific purpose of satisfying the industrial and commercial interests described above. It was founded in the early 20th century to meet traditional and spontaneous interests of economic operators.

40. The distinguishing features of the Ente Fiera's activities and the way in which it functions also lead the Commission to the conclusion that its activities are industrial or commercial in nature. It is true that the Ente Fiera is not profit-orientated, but this only means that profits are not distributed but retained by it. Furthermore, the Ente Fiera is managed according to the criteria of performance, efficiency and cost-effectiveness and it finances itself from the proceeds of exercising its activities. Therefore, the Ente Fiera does make profits and reinvests them so as to remain self-financing.

41. Apart from that, the Ente Fiera is in competition with other private organisers and bodies in the organisation and management of fairs, so in this respect, too, it enjoys no privileges. According to the case-law, this is an indicator of needs having an industrial or commercial character. The presence of competition is in itself admittedly not enough to exclude the possibility that the relevant body is guided by something other than economic considerations. However, according to Article 1 of its articles of association, the Ente Fiera is required to pursue its activities in a manner ensuring high performance, efficiency and cost-effectiveness. It follows from this, combined with the fact that there is competition on the relevant market, that we are here dealing with industrial and commercial needs.

42. The Commission also refers to its Interpretative Communication already cited. It confirms that the Ente Fiera carries out a remunerative activity in a context characterised by competition.

VI - Opinion

A - Admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling in Case C-223/99

43. No concerns were raised as to the admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling in Case C-260/99. However, the Ente Fiera claims that the reference in Case C-223/99 is inadmissible, because the question referred concerns the interpretation not of Community law but of Italian law.

44. As explained under Applicable Provisions, the Community definition of a body governed by public law was adopted by Italian law when Directive 92/50 was implemented. According to the information from the national court, the interpretation of that definition is of decisive significance as regards the application of the rules on administrative transparency, Law No 241 of 7 August 1990. So, the question referred concerns the interpretation of the notion of a body governed by public law within the meaning of Directive 92/50. It follows that the question relates to the interpretation of secondary Community law and therefore a subject admissible under Article 234 EC.

45. The extent to which the question referred for a preliminary ruling is necessary for the decision in the main litigation is in principle a matter to be determined by the national court alone and is not examined by this Court. There is a possible exception to this principle where there is manifestly no connection between the question referred and the main proceedings or where the question is general or hypothetical in nature. However, the question referred in Case C-223/99 cannot be said to be inadmissible on those grounds. The national court stated in the order for reference that the question whether the Ente Fiera is bound by the Italian transparency rules at issue in the main proceedings depends on its possible classification as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50. The reference for a preliminary ruling in Case C-223/99 is therefore admissible.

B - Interpretation of Article 1 of Directive 92/50

46. In order for the Ente Fiera to be regarded as a contracting authority, the following three conditions must, according to Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50, be satisfied. The Ente Fiera must have legal personality, be subject to state control and have been established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character. According to the case-law, these conditions are cumulative.

1. Legal personality of the Ente Fiera

47. The Ente Fiera was transformed by Royal Decree of 1 July 1922 from an initiative (iniziativa) into a legal person (ente morale). It has legal personality by virtue of the rules in the third sentence of Article 1(1), Article 1(3), and Article 3 of its articles of association in conjunction with the Royal Decree. The condition in the second indent of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 is thereby fulfilled.

2. Influence of the State and of other regional or local authorities on the Ente Fiera

48. More than half of the Ente Fiera's administrative board are representatives of the ministries of the central State and of the regional and district administration (Article 6 of the articles of association), and the President is appointed by the President of the Republic (Article 5(1) of the articles of association). The Minister for Industry appoints the Vice-Presidents (Article 5(3) of the articles of association). The management of the Ente Fiera is therefore designated by the State and other regional or local authorities. Moreover, the Ente Fiera is, pursuant to Article 15 of its articles of association, subject to the control of the Minister for Industry and, under Article 16, can even be liquidated by him or her. To this extent its management too is subject to State supervision. In the light of the decision in Connemara Machine Turf in particular, according to which even the possibility of indirect control by the State is sufficient, there can be no doubt about this. The powers of central government in respect of the Ente Fiera were admittedly transferred by Decree of the Council of Ministers of 7 July 1999 to the government of the region of Lombardy. But the latter is also a regional authority, and the management organs of the Ente Fiera are thus still appointed by regional or local authorities and its activity controlled by them within the meaning of the third indent of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50.

3. Establishment for the specific purpose of meeting needs of general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character

49. As the national court has observed, it follows from the foregoing that, as to the extent to which the Ente Fiera is a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1 of Directive 92/50, it is only necessary to examine whether it is a body established for the specific purpose of meetings needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character (first indent of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50).

(a) Establishment for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest

50. The first issue is whether the Ente Fiera was established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50.

51. According to Article 1 of the articles of association, the objects of the Ente Fiera... are to carry on and facilitate any activity concerned with the organisation of fairs and conferences and any other initiative which, by fostering trade relations, promotes the presentation of the production of goods and services and if possible their sale. It follows that the Ente Fiera was founded for the purpose of organising fairs and conferences. What is in question is whether this is a need in the general interest.

52. The first point supporting the argument that we are dealing with needs in the general interest is the wording of the second sentence of Article 1(1) of the Ente Fiera's articles of association which provides that it is not its purpose to make profits and that its activities are pursued in the public interest.

53. The parties to the main proceedings do not dispute that the organisation of fairs and exhibitions is in the general interest. The Consiglio di Stato and the Corte suprema di cassazione, in their more recent case-law cited above, also conclude that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest. Only the Commission disputes that this condition is satisfied. It bases that view on the limited category of persons whose interests the activity of the Ente Fiera serves.

54. The Court does not appear in its case-law on public procurement hitherto to have considered the extent to which the organisation of fairs is an activity in the general interest. The following duties have so far been recognised as being in the general interest: the issue of official documents such as passports, driving licences and identity cards, the collection and treatment of household refuse, the maintenance of national woods and of a forestry industry and the running of a university. In addition, Advocate General Fennelly has classified the operation of public telecommunications networks and the provision of public communications services as being in the general interest and Advocate General Mischo has assumed that Offices publics d'aménagement et de construction and a Société anonyme d'habitations à loyer modéré likewise operate in the general interest.

55. The examples cited in fact relate to situations where the general public in principle has access. However, there are certain services, such as for example attendance at university, that can only be taken up by certain persons, namely those who satisfy the conditions for admission. Similarly, flats in the social housing sector are only allocated to those in need. If one compares these activities to the organisation of fairs, it can be seen that fairs, too, are sometimes only open to a certain category of the public, as, for example, in the case of trade fairs. But anyone who satisfies the conditions laid down by the organiser - so, say, anyone who operates in the sector of the economy to which the fair relates - can exhibit. Contrary to the view of the Commission, it does not appear to be justified to deduce from the fact that direct users of fairs are a limited group that the organisation of fairs does not serve the general interest. Thus, just as the general public benefits from university research and its contribution to the level of knowledge in general, so also do fairs, by bringing together manufacturers and retailers, serve the interests of consumers who may, for example, obtain goods from individual retailers via wholesalers and retailers who have acquired information at the fair. As the Commission has stated in its Interpretative Communication on the sector of fairs, fairs and exhibitions represent a sales promotion instrument, which serves the growing need for communication and information in the economy and helps optimise consumer choice. The fact that the class of participants is restricted therefore does not undermine the view that fairs are organised in the general interest.

56. We may therefore assume by way of an initial conclusion that the Ente Fiera meets needs in the general interest.

(b) Type of needs met

57. Lastly, in order for the Ente Fiera to be classified as a body governed by public law, the needs met by it must not [have] an industrial or commercial character. The real dispute between the parties in the main proceedings revolves around the interpretation and application of this criterion. The plaintiffs think that the Ente Fiera does not carry on an industrial or commercial activity, whereas the Ente Fiera itself and the Commission are of the view that organising fairs is a purely industrial or commercial activity. The latter view is shared by the Consiglio di Stato and the Corte suprema di cassazione.

58. So far as can be seen, the only case in which the Court has made any finding on the criterion of needs not having an industrial or commercial character to date is BFI Holding. It stated that it is clear from the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50, in its different language versions, that the absence of an industrial or commercial character is a criterion intended to clarify the meaning of the term "needs in the general interest" as used in that provision. As justification it relied primarily on the practical effectiveness of the provision. For [i]f the Community legislature had considered that all needs in the general interest were not of an industrial or commercial character it would not have said so because, in that context, the second component of the definition would serve no purpose.

59. One must therefore agree with the Commission that characterising needs not having an industrial or commercial character entails defining the concept of needs in the general interest more narrowly. However, it is not clear how industrial or commercial needs in the general interest may be distinguished from those that are not... industrial or commercial, and whether the need met by the Ente Fiera for fairs to be organised is industrial or commercial or not.

60. Agorà infers that the Ente Fiera's activity is not... industrial or commercial in character, principally from the second sentence of Article 1(1) of the articles of association, which state that the Ente Fiera is non-profit-making (L'Ente non ha fini di lucro ...). This argument must be accepted at least to the extent that an industrial or commercial activity in principle aims to produce a commercial profit.

61. The inference of this provision is supported by Article 16 of the Ente Fiera's articles of association. Article 16(1) provides that the Minister for Industry can transfer the management of the Ente Fiera to a commissioner if general administration is no longer effective or serious irregularities are found. Further, under Article 16(2), the Minister for Industry can even liquidate the Ente Fiera, either because its objects are no longer achievable or on public interest grounds. The possibility of liquidation on public interest grounds is, however, difficult to reconcile with the view that the Ente Fiera meets industrial or commercial needs. Where an undertaking meets needs having an industrial or commercial character, it may be liquidated either on grounds of insolvency or because the owner no longer has any interest in its continued existence. The first eventuality is dictated by economic considerations alone and the second reflects the private owner's right of disposal. Article 16(2) of the articles of association could therefore be an indication that the Ente primarily fulfils needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character.

62. However, the Commission and the Ente Fiera, arguing that the needs met by the Ente Fiera are industrial or commercial in character, point first of all to the Commission's Interpretative Communication on the sector of fairs, which makes clear that the organisation of fairs is an industrial or commercial activity. The Consiglio di Stato argues, along the same lines, that the organisation of fairs is connected with the advertising and marketing of goods and services and therefore complements business manufacturing. The Corte suprema di cassazione views the organisation of fairs as supporting exhibitors' economic and business activities and, on this basis, classifies the organisation of fairs as an industrial or commercial activity.

63. In the Commission's Interpretative Communication, fairs are described as events with a commercial purpose. However, it must be emphasised that the fact that the exhibitors at a fair pursue activities having an industrial or commercial character does not necessarily mean that organising the fair itself is industrial or commercial in character. The organiser of a fair may well be pursuing non-commercial objects, such as a local policy to develop an area as a location for fairs or the promotion of sales of regional and local products, by creating a convenient opportunity to present them.

64. The Commission's Interpretative Communication describes the activity of fairs in general and states that they are a concrete expression of the market concept. Fairs are further described as a sales promotion instrument supplementary to advertising in that they bring together supply and demand in an environment favourable to operators. They offer participants an opportunity to find out more about the market, identify new trends, assess the competition and make new contacts. But nowhere is the organisation of fairs as such categorically stated to constitute an industrial or commercial activity. On the contrary, the communication expressly excepts measures of a purely private nature adopted by economic operators or groups of them involved in the fair sector. Therefore, it is doubtful whether and to what extent this communication is applicable to commercially organised fairs at all. It seems to be all the more doubtful as the communication is only intended to contribute to the compatibility of national measures governing the organising of fairs with the principles of Community law, in particular the freedom of establishment and the free movement of services and goods. If the communication expressly excepts measures of a purely private nature from its scope of application, this is rather an indication that there undoubtedly are fairs that are organised for reasons that are not purely industrial or commercial. Accordingly, no inference may be drawn from the communication to establish whether the Ente Fiera's activities are industrial or commercial in character.

65. The Consiglio di Stato further cites in support of its view that the Ente Fiera is not classifiable as a public body the fact that the Ente Fiera's objects are laid down by a founding document under private law and that its capital finance came from the investors on the committee. However, this argument is not persuasive either. It cannot be inferred from the fact that the Ente Fiera is founded on a private-law founding document that the needs it meets are industrial or commercial. According to the case-law, with a view to giving full effect to the principle of freedom of movement, the term "contracting authority" must be interpreted in functional terms.... In view of that need, no distinction should be drawn by reference to the legal form of the provisions setting up the entity and specifying the needs which it is to meet. The private-law act establishing the Ente Fiera does not therefore constitute grounds for assuming the existence of needs having an industrial or commercial character.

66. According to the Commission and the Ente Fiera, the non-profit-making rule referred to above merely means that profits are not paid out to the shareholders but are to be reinvested. Furthermore it must be observed in this connection that, under Article 1(2) of the articles of association, the Ente Fiera is managed according to the criteria of performance, efficiency and cost-effectiveness and, under Article 3(1) of the articles of association, the Ente Fiera is to pursue the objects for which it was created using the proceeds arising from carrying on its activities.

67. Finally, the fact that the profits that the Ente Fiera indisputably makes are not distributed but are reinvested in the company and that the Ente Fiera must, under Article 3 of its articles of association, finance its activities from its own income point to the existence of an industrial or commercial activity. The articles of association do not contain any provision whereby any losses incurred may be offset by the public authorities. The Ente Fiera thus bears the economic and financial consequences of its activities itself. But the fact that the articles of association do not provide for the possibility of losses being financed out of the public purse, suggests that it is an industrial or commercial activity that is being carried on. One of the characteristics of an industrial or commercial activity is that the undertaking bears the economic risk of its own transactions.

68. To this circumstance must be added the fact that the Ente Fiera stands in competition with other organisers of fairs, as the Commission and the Ente Fiera submit. The decision of the Corte suprema di cassazione also contains the same argument.

69. In this respect it must be found that, according to the case-law of the Court, the existence of competition in the area of the activity in question is an indicator of an industrial or commercial activity. This circumstance admittedly does not of itself preclude a finding of an activity not... having an industrial or commercial character. But, together with the fact that the Ente Fiera alone bears the financial risk of its operations, it supports the view that the activity of the Ente Fiera should be regarded as industrial or commercial. The pressure of competition makes it improbable that the Ente Fiera would be guided in its decisions by non-economic considerations.

70. Nor does it seem necessary from the spirit and purpose of Directive 92/50 to include the Ente Fiera in the category of bodies governed by public law bound by the public procurement rules to avoid the risk of preference being given to national tenderers or applicants whenever a contract is awarded by the contracting authorities. The concept of a body governed by public law is to be understood in a functional way if this goal is to be effectively realised. Accordingly, in assessing whether a particular body satisfies the conditions of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 it must always be asked whether, in the contracts awarded by it, there is actually a risk of discrimination between tenderers on grounds of nationality.

71. On the basis of the financing rules in the articles of association, the Ente Fiera may in principle only be guided by economic considerations. This financial risk typically exists in the case of entrepreneurial activities. In the case of undertakings that meet community needs not having an industrial or commercial character, there are always possibilities for the public purse, to ensure that such needs are met, to make up any losses that may be suffered so that it does not become impossible for the allocated tasks not having industrial or commercial character to be performed.

72. Despite its non-profit-making status and the close state connection, the fact that the economic and financial risk is borne by Ente Fiera alone ensures that there is no danger of any inclination to favour national service providers in awarding contracts.

73. In conclusion, therefore, it must be found that, according to its articles of association, the Ente Fiera was established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest having an industrial or commercial character. It follows that the requirements for the definition of a body governed by public law within the meaning of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 are not fulfilled in the case of a body such as the Ente Fiera.

VII - Conclusion

74. On the basis of the foregoing considerations I propose that the question referred should be answered as follows:

The definition of a body governed by public law in Article 1(b) of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 does not include bodies which, like the Ente Fiera, meet needs in the general interest, are non-profit-making, and are closely connected with public regional or local authorities, but which finance themselves exclusively from their assets and their own income, and bear the economic and financial risk of their activity themselves without there being any possibility of any losses being offset from the public purse.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Mischo delivered on 30 November 2000.
Asociacion Profesional de Empresas Navieras de Líneas Regulares (Analir) and Others v Administracion General del Estado.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunal Supremo - Spain.
Freedom to provide services - Maritime cabotage - Conditions for the grant and continuation of prior administrative authorisation - Concurrent application of the methods of imposing public service obligations and of concluding public service contracts.
Case C-205/99.

1 In this reference for a preliminary ruling, the Tribunal Supremo (Supreme Court) (Spain) has asked the Court to interpret Council Regulation (EEC) No 3577/92 of 7 December 1992 applying the principle of freedom to provide services to maritime transport within Member States (maritime cabotage) (1) (hereinafter `the Regulation') in order to enable it to render judgment on the compatibility with that regulation of Spanish Royal Decree No 1466/1997 of 19 September 1997 on the legal rules governing regular maritime cabotage lines and public-interest shipping (BoE No 226 of 20 September 1997, p. 27712) (hereinafter `Royal Decree No 1466').

Legal framework

2 Article 1(1) of the Regulation provides that:

`As from 1 January 1993, freedom to provide maritime transport services within a Member State (maritime cabotage) shall apply to Community shipowners who have their ships registered in, and flying the flag of, a Member State...'.

3 Article 2(3) of the Regulation specifies that:

`"a public service contract" shall mean a contract concluded between the competent authorities of a Member State and a Community shipowner in order to provide the public with adequate transport services.

A public service contract may cover notably:

- transport services satisfying fixed standards of continuity, regularity, capacity and quality,

- additional transport services,

- transport services at specified rates and subject to specified conditions, in particular for certain categories of passengers or on certain routes,

- adjustments of services to actual requirements'.

4 Article 2(4) states that `public service obligations' are to mean obligations which the Community shipowner in question, if he were considering his own commercial interest, would not assume or would not assume to the same extent or under the same conditions.

5 Article 4 of the Regulation provides that:

`1. A Member State may conclude public service contracts with, or impose public service obligations as a condition for the provision of cabotage services on, shipping companies participating in regular services to, from and between islands.

2. In imposing public service obligations, Member States shall be limited to requirements concerning ports to be served, regularity, continuity, frequency, capacity to provide the service, rates to be charged and manning of the vessel.

Where applicable, any compensation for public service obligations must be available to all Community shipowners.'

B - National law

6 Royal Decree No 1466 declares all regular lines between the peninsula and the islands, those connecting the peninsula with Ceuta or Melilla and those linking the non-peninsular territories to one another to be public-interest shipping.

7 Royal Decree No 1466 lays down three different systems:

- a system of notification for peninsular cabotage (Article 3),

- a system of public-interest contracts (Article 4),

- a system of prior administrative authorisation (Articles 6 and 8).

8 The administrative authorisation provided for in Royal Decree No 1466 is subject to two types of condition:

- a requirement to have no outstanding tax or social security debts (Article 6),

- requirements concerning regularity, continuity, capacity to provide the service, manning and, where appropriate, the ports to be served, frequency and, where relevant, rates (Article 8).

The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

9 The Asociacion Profesional de Empresas Navieras de Líneas Regulares (Analir) and Others (hereinafter `Analir and Others') brought an action for annulment of Royal Decree No 1466 on the grounds that it is incompatible with Community law, and the national court has referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling:

`(1) May Article 4, in conjunction with Article 1, of Council Regulation (EEC) No 3577/92 of 7 December 1992 applying the principle of freedom to provide services to maritime transport within Member States (maritime cabotage) be interpreted as permitting the provision of island cabotage services by undertakings covering regular shipping lines to be made subject to prior administrative authorisation?

(2) If so, may the grant and continuation of such administrative authorisation be made subject to conditions, such as having no outstanding tax or social debts, other than those set out in Article 4(2) of the Regulation?

(3) May Article 4(1) of Regulation No 3577/92 be interpreted as permitting public service obligations to be imposed on some shipping companies and public service contracts within the meaning of Article 1(3) of the Regulation to be concluded with others at the same time for the same line or route, in order to ensure the same regular traffic to, from or between islands?'

10 The national court points out that, when Royal Decree No 1466, which the applicants in the main proceedings seek to annul, was adopted, the Kingdom of Spain enjoyed an exemption until 1 January 1999 from the obligation to liberalise maritime cabotage. That court adds, however, rightly in my view, that the questions raised have not become irrelevant ratione temporis. It notes in its order made on 12 May 1999, and therefore after the exemption had expired, that the national provisions whose validity it is called upon to adjudge were not amended when the exemption expired and were intended to be permanent provisions.

11 It should be noted, as a preliminary point, that the question raised refers to the possibility of a Member State using a system of prior authorisation linked to the imposition of public service obligations. The measures which a Member State may take in the interests of safeguarding the safety of shipping or the operational requirements of port infrastructure (access to quays, for example) are not therefore at issue in the present case.

12 It is not disputed that the Regulation seeks to implement the principle of freedom to provide services in relation to maritime cabotage.

13 That is evident from both the title of the Regulation, set out above, and its preamble, which states that `the abolition of restrictions on the provision of maritime transport services within Member States is necessary for the establishment of the internal market', which comprises an area in which the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital is ensured. It follows that `freedom to provide services should be applied to maritime transport within Member States'. (2)

14 That principle is embodied in Article 1(1) of the Regulation, cited above.

15 Nor do the parties dispute that the requirement of prior authorisation, which by definition implies that the services may not be provided until the authorisation is granted, is a restriction on freedom to provide services.

16 The divergence of views between the various parties involved concerns whether, and where relevant to what extent, a restriction of that nature may be justified by the public service needs to which the Regulation relates.

17 The applicants in the main proceedings accept that Member States may consider it necessary to impose public service obligations on operators, but do not believe that a Member State is bound as a result to make the provision of services conditional upon prior authorisation. In the applicants' view, compliance with such obligations could be ensured by a system of licences granted by category of line and by declaration procedures.

18 The Kingdom of Spain and the Hellenic Republic adopt a diametrically opposed position and contend that, quite evidently, a system of prior authorisation is necessary in order to guarantee the performance of public service obligations.

19 The Spanish Government lays emphasis on the following arguments in support of its proposition that the requirement of administrative authorisation does not hinder the liberalisation of island cabotage.

20 It stresses, first, how significant it is, both in terms of the Spanish Constitution and of Community law, that the destinations in question are islands, citing in particular in this regard Article 227(2) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 299 EC) and Declaration No 30 on island regions, annexed to the Final Act of the Treaty of Amsterdam.

21 The Spanish Government infers that `the existence of islands gives rise to characteristics and peculiarities which may, at the unfettered discretion of each State, warrant special systems of protection'.

22 Furthermore, Spanish law correctly considers that the cabotage in question is a public service. It satisfies the conditions set out by the case-law of the Court (3) in that it is universal, continuous, in the public interest and regulated by the public authorities.

23 The Commission points out, however, rightly in my view, that the question whether or not it is open to a Member State to classify certain cabotage services as public services is not raised in the present case. The dispute in fact concerns the consequences which a Member State is entitled to attribute to such a classification.

24 According to the Spanish Government, a Member State may define all island cabotage as having the characteristics of a public service and thus having to be subject to public service obligations, compliance with which cannot be ensured other than by a system of prior authorisation.

25 The Commission, supported by the Norwegian Government, considers, on the contrary, that such a system may be used only in well-defined circumstances. I share that view.

26 Indeed, systematic analysis of the provisions of the Regulation leaves scant room for doubt as to the relationship between Article 1, which sets out the principle of freedom to provide services, and Article 4, which gives Member States power to conclude public service contracts or to impose public service obligations. This option is to be seen as the exception, and freedom to provide services as the rule.

27 Nor, moreover, do the various parties involved disagree on this point.

28 It follows that freedom to provide services can be restricted in the interests of public-service needs only if, and to the extent that, it is clearly imperative to do so in order to ensure adequate transport services.

29 That understanding is confirmed by the terms of the ninth recital in the preamble to the Regulation which states that `the introduction of public services entailing certain rights and obligations for the shipowners concerned may be justified in order to ensure the adequacy of regular transport services to, from and between islands'.

30 The proposition according to which public service obligations must be used only where market forces are insufficient to provide adequate services is also articulated in Article 2(4) of the Regulation, from which it can be seen that `public service obligations' are those which `the Community shipowner in question, if he were considering his own commercial interest, would not assume or would not assume to the same extent or under the same conditions'.

31 The foregoing analysis of the provisions of the Regulation is furthermore confirmed by the case-law of the Court on freedom to provide services, from which it is discernible that this is one of the fundamental freedoms under Community law, and that any derogation from that freedom must be interpreted strictly and must comply with the principles of proportionality and non-discrimination. (4)

32 In the circumstances of the present case, the effect of those principles is that operators can be required to be in possession of prior authorisation only to the extent necessary to oblige them to provide services which they would not provide in an environment of free competition.

33 That can be established only by analysing each of the services in question, in order to identify which of them are liable to be inadequately provided under free market conditions.

34 Conversely, a Member State cannot stipulate, in advance and without analysis on a case by case basis, that an entire category of services, such as, in the present case, services with and between islands, if they are to be adequately provided, requires the adoption of measures which restrict freedom to provide services.

35 It is possible, admittedly, that the competent authorities of a Member State may reach the conclusion, on completion of such an analysis, that none of the services in that category can be adequately provided in an environment of free competition.

36 In the present case, however, the Spanish Government itself draws attention to the great diversity of lines operating between the peninsula and the islands and between islands. That statement suggests that some at least of those services could be adequately provided in an environment of free competition and that it is perhaps not necessary to impose public service obligations for all services with and between islands.

37 Nor can I see why the diversity of the lines in question should be an obstacle to each of those lines being analysed individually, as the Spanish Government seems to suggest. On the contrary, it is that very diversity which calls for examination on a case by case basis, since it means that a decision which is valid for one crossing will not necessarily be so for another. I would also comment that the aforementioned lines are not so numerous that a case by case analysis of that nature would be unfeasible.

38 The Spanish Government draws an analogy between maritime cabotage and the telecommunications sector, which is in its view an example of another liberalised economic sector in which the provision of services remains subject to a system of authorisation.

39 The fact is, however, that such an analogy, confined as it is to the fact that both are economic sectors in the process of liberalisation, does not, in the light of what has been said above, constitute a ground for concluding that a system of prior authorisation is acceptable without restriction in relation to maritime cabotage.

40 The Spanish Government, supported by the Greek Government, further points out in support of its proposition that Article 4(1) of the Regulation provides that Member States may impose public service obligations as a condition for the provision of cabotage services to and between islands.

41 That argument undoubtedly carries considerable weight, but it does not follow as a matter of course that compliance with those conditions must necessarily be checked beforehand. It is no less conceivable that the competent authorities could make the necessary checks using a system of declaration. The case-law of the Court, furthermore, contains examples of solutions of that type relating to fundamental freedoms under Community law, such as the free movement of capital. (5)

42 Is it right to conclude, therefore, that it is permissible to require prior authorisation in relation to public service obligations provided it is confined to those services which would not be adequately provided in an environment of free competition and provided it is applied in a non-discriminatory manner?

43 The Commission makes a number of relevant observations in that regard.

44 It points out first of all that, even in such circumstances, the national authorities have a duty not to use a system of prior authorisation unless due performance of the public service cannot be supervised by other means.

45 It adds that the purpose of the system of prior authorisation must not be to restrict access to the market, but exclusively to safeguard the public service. I fully share that view. It is, therefore, public-service needs which constitute the only requirement which can justify such a system. That system must, accordingly, have no aim other than to maintain the public service, and competition must be impeded only in so far as is necessary for that end. Conversely, no restriction on access to the market can be justified which is not necessary in terms of the requirements of the public service.

46 It necessarily follows, as the Commission moreover states, that the conditions for the grant of the authorisation must not involve any discretion on the part of the competent authorities. Any undertaking which satisfies the public service obligations laid down, which obligations must, of course, fall within the scope of what is permitted under Article 4(2) of the Regulation, must be able automatically to obtain authorisation.

47 Furthermore, for access to the market in question to be genuine, the conditions for authorisation must be transparent and legal certainty must be ensured. The conditions for obtaining authorisation must therefore be known in advance, justified according to objective criteria and applicable in the same way to all operators entitled to access. Otherwise, an operator would be unable to predict the liabilities it will have to bear and would thus be deterred from applying for authorisation.

48 The Commission also refers to a letter of formal notice sent to the Spanish authorities on 22 October 1997, which stated, in any event, that Royal Decree No 1466 brings in new restrictions on freedom to provide services, in particular by setting up a system of prior authorisation for all services with and between islands. Accordingly, it constitutes an infringement of Article 7 of the Regulation which, by reference to Article 62 of the EC Treaty (repealed by the Treaty of Amsterdam), enacts a standstill clause in relation to restrictions on maritime cabotage.

49 It should be noted, however, that the national court has not asked the Court for a preliminary ruling on whether Article 7 is applicable to the present case.

50 Having regard to the foregoing, the reply to the first question must be as follows:

`Article 1 and Article 4(2) of the Regulation must be interpreted as not permitting the provision of island cabotage services by undertakings covering regular shipping lines to be made subject to prior administrative authorisation, unless the Member State can demonstrate that:

- in an environment of free competition the public service could not be ensured, in an adequate manner, on the lines subject to authorisation;

- operators' compliance with the public service obligations can be supervised only by means of a system of prior authorisation;

- the conditions for issue of the authorisation are defined, predictable, transparent and non-discriminatory;

- operators who satisfy the public service obligations set by the Member State are automatically granted authorisation.'

51 This question is clearly raised only for the eventuality that the reply to the first is in the affirmative. Since I have given a qualified response to the first question, I find it necessary to answer the second.

52 The national court seeks to ascertain whether the grant and continuation of the authorisation may be made subject to conditions, such as having no outstanding tax or social security debts, other than those listed in Article 4(2) of the Regulation and having no specific connection with the services which are the subject-matter of the authorisation.

53 The applicants in the main proceedings claim that the grant and continuation of the prior authorisation required under Royal Decree No 1466 for island cabotage cannot be made subject to the condition of having no outstanding tax or social security debts.

54 According to the applicants, the Treaty permits restrictions on the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services only where they are justified by non-economic public-interest requirements which are proportionate and non-discriminatory.

55 In their view, that is not so in the present case, since the obligation at issue has no direct connection with the maritime traffic subject to authorisation.

56 Furthermore, Article 5 of the EC Treaty (now Article 10 EC) prohibits Member States from introducing new restrictions on freedom to provide services, such as the conditions at issue.

57 The Norwegian Government shares the view of Analir and Others that Article 4(2) of the Regulation does not permit the obligations at issue to be imposed. Indeed, that provision makes no mention of them whereas it is evident from both the wording and the purpose of the Regulation that that text is exhaustive.

58 The Spanish Government points out, however, that the conditions at issue are not `public service obligations', but are general conditions for the grant of administrative authorisation.

59 It follows that they would not infringe Article 4 of the Regulation, even if that provision were to be regarded as exhaustive.

60 The Spanish Government also contends, in line with the Commission's view, that an obligation to have no outstanding tax or social security debts is essential in order to ensure a degree of solvency on the part of the undertakings called upon to provide public services and is therefore such as to ensure that provision of that service will not be jeopardised by the provider's insolvency.

61 The Commission states, in that regard, that capacity to provide the service, within the meaning of Article 4(2) of the Regulation, must be understood to include economic and financial capacity.

62 It emerges both from the observations of the national court and from the arguments put forward by the Spanish Government that a distinction must be made here between two types of consideration.

63 First, the question arises whether, in general, Member States are entitled to make exercise of the activity in question subject to conditions relating to matters not referred to in Article 4(2).

64 It follows from the actual wording of the Regulation that this is so.

65 The Regulation states in Article 1(1), cited above, that `freedom to provide ... services... shall apply to Community shipowners who have their ships registered in, and flying the flag of, a Member State, provided that these ships comply with all conditions for carrying out cabotage in that Member State'. (6)

66 Similarly, Article 3(2) provides that `[f]or vessels carrying out island cabotage, all matters relating to manning shall be the responsibility of the State in which the vessel is performing a maritime transport service (host State)'. (7)

67 It necessarily follows that a Member State may, under those two provisions, impose conditions relating to matters not covered by Article 4(2).

68 It follows in particular from Article 1(1) cited above that, where a shipowner wished to provide cabotage services in Spain using ships registered in, and flying the flag of, that State, those ships would be bound to comply with the conditions required, under Spanish law, for carrying out cabotage in Spain. In such circumstances, there would be nothing to prevent those conditions from including, where appropriate, an obligation for the shipowner to have no outstanding tax or social security debts.

69 That consideration brings me to the second issue which it is my duty to examine in the context of this reference for a preliminary ruling.

70 Even if, as has been seen, the obligations relating to tax and social security debts, to which the national judge refers, can, in the circumstances described above, have their basis in provisions other than Article 4(2), this does not preclude those obligations from also being treated as public service obligations within the meaning of that provision, which may on that basis be imposed by the host Member State on shipowners, whether they are established in Spain or in another Member State.

71 As the Commission and the Spanish Government rightly point out, a shipowner's inability to pay its tax and social security debts may be an indication of serious financial difficulties liable to lead to insolvency and interruption of the public service.

72 Accordingly, inclusion amongst the conditions for authorisation of a criterion enabling the shipowner's solvency to be assessed does not amount to an unduly broad interpretation of the wording of Article 4(2) of the Regulation, even though, as has been seen, since that provision is an exception to the principle of freedom to provide services, it must be interpreted strictly.

73 Nor is that conclusion shaken by the fact, pointed out both by Analir and Others and by the national court, that the conditions at issue are not specifically connected with the services to be provided. They are in a more general way, as has been seen, an indication of the financial ability to perform services of that nature in the long-term.

74 Furthermore, a company should not obtain a competitive advantage over others which duly pay their taxes and social security contributions.

75 I would also comment in this regard that, as the Spanish Government points out, conditions of this sort are not unknown in Community law. They are in fact explicitly laid down by the public procurement directives. (8) These, however, relate primarily to more ad hoc relationships between economic operators and authorities.

76 There is all the more reason, therefore, to accept the imposition of such conditions in the present case, which concerns public services which must be provided over a certain length of time, and not merely episodically.

77 It should also be made clear, as the Commission does, that application of those conditions must be non-discriminatory.

78 As I have already had occasion to say on examining the first question, it emerges both from the case-law of the Court and from general principles of Community law that a restriction on an inherent freedom under that law can be justified only where it does not lead to discrimination.

79 The Commission is likewise well-founded in pointing out that the conditions at issue were already in existence, under other instruments, prior to Royal Decree No 1466, and are not therefore a new restriction and accordingly incompatible with the provisions of the Regulation.

80 In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the Court reply as follows to the second question referred for a preliminary ruling:

`Article 4(2) of the Regulation does not preclude the grant or continuation of the authorisation referred to in the first question from being made subject to the condition that the service provider have no outstanding tax or social security debts, provided that this condition is applied on a non-discriminatory basis.'

The third question

81 By this question, (9) the Tribunal Supremo asks the Court whether the Regulation permits public service obligations to be imposed on some companies and, at the same time, public service contracts to be concluded with others for the same line or route. It states that that is the situation in Spain, by virtue of Royal Decree No 1466.

82 The applicants in the main proceedings believe that the reply to the question should be in the negative. In their view, the authorities' intervention should be confined to ensuring that the services in question are provided adequately, continuously and satisfactorily. It follows from the case-law of the Court that those authorities should pursue that triple objective at the lowest possible cost to the public body.

83 Consequently, they assert, the adoption of measures such as concluding a public service contract or imposing public service obligations would be possible only if the services offered did not meet those three criteria.

84 In such a situation, it would be appropriate to impose public service obligations if the inadequacy of the services offered affected only one of those criteria. If, on the other hand, none of those criteria was satisfied, it would be appropriate to conclude a public service contract.

85 Analir and Others also consider it to be contradictory for a Member State to make the same traffic subject simultaneously to the contract system and the system of public service obligations.

86 Furthermore, the existence of a contract entails the grant of special rights and, accordingly, the need to comply with Article 90 of the EC Treaty (now Article 86 EC). By granting such advantages to one company whilst at the same time imposing public service obligations on other service providers who might offer a competing service, a Member State is acting in a disproportionate manner and infringing Article 86 of the EC Treaty (now Article 82 EC), which should be applied in conjunction with Article 90.

87 The conditions for applying the derogation laid down in Article 90(2) are not satisfied, since that derogation presupposes that the measures adopted are proportionate to the objective relied on, and that is not so in the present case.

88 On that point, Analir and Others cite a study which, according to them, shows that regular services to the islands are adequate. There is therefore no justification for grouping all those services together to make them the subject-matter of a single public service contract.

89 The applicants in the main proceedings believe that, in reality, the sole purpose of Royal Decree No 1466, which permits the imposition of public service obligations concurrently with the conclusion of a public service contract, is to protect the company Transmed, which could not survive without the grant of public subsidies.

90 The Norwegian Government, which in its written observations had defended the view that the two means of ensuring public service provision set out in Article 4(2) of the Regulation are mutually exclusive, changed its position at the hearing.

91 It considers ultimately that both mechanisms can be used simultaneously in relation to a single line or route, but that the two in combination must not cause a distortion of competition which would not have occurred had only one of the mechanisms been used.

92 The French Government defends a diametrically opposed point of view. It distinguishes two possible situations.

93 First, it maintains that a Member State is entitled to conclude a public service contract in relation to traffic already covered by public service obligations.

94 According to that government, it might be found, despite the imposition of public service obligations by the authorities, that the service offered remains below the level which the State considers adequate. Such a situation would require the conclusion of a public service contract, and the principle of proportionality might dictate that the subject-matter of that contract be limited to what would be necessary to meet the unsatisfied needs of the public service.

95 In such a situation, on a single route, regular lines covered by public service obligations would therefore exist alongside an operator bound by a public service contract which would contain the same public service obligations (and, possibly, others).

96 Secondly, the French Government asserts that it is also possible to impose public service obligations where the route in question is already covered by a public service contract. Otherwise, it contends, the contract-holding operator might withdraw from the market as soon as it was faced with competition from other companies not subject to public service obligations. Accordingly, the adequacy of the service, supposedly guaranteed by conclusion of the contract, might be jeopardised.

97 The Commission's analysis contains interesting similarities with that of the French Government, but also a number of significant refinements.

98 The Commission maintains that there is nothing, in principle, to prevent a Member State from deciding to impose public service obligations generally, either by means of a system of notification or by a system of authorisation, and from concluding a public service contract for one or more lines subject to those obligations in order to ensure an adequate level of service.

99 It points out that, just as public service obligations must be imposed in a transparent and non-discriminatory manner, with no exercise of discretion, public service contracts must be concluded on the basis of a public call for tenders ensuring equal treatment and an equal chance of success for all operators.

100 The Commission considers it necessary to invoke a further condition. Public service obligations imposed in the context of a general system must in any event be less onerous than those required by a public service contract, so as not to distort competition between operators.

101 The existence of a system of public service obligations alongside one of public service contracts thus ensures access to the market for all operators, whilst preventing competitors of the contract-holding company from damaging its interests by capturing the market during the tourist season. Conversely, according to the Commission, the presence of a number of different operators also enables a reduction in the level of financial compensation paid to the contract-holder.

102 Finally, the Commission reiterates that, in any event, a system of public service obligations existing alongside public service contracts is preferable to a system of exclusive contracts having the effect of closing the market for several years.

103 The Spanish Government, for its part, considers public service contracts and public service obligations to be two complementary mechanisms. There is nothing, therefore, to preclude using them concurrently, although contracts should remain exceptional, given the environment of liberalisation of which they form part.

104 In the view of the Spanish Government, a contract gives the authority greater security in terms of public service provision, particularly since it generates reciprocal rights and obligations, or enables the authority to include terms which, if the contract is terminated, ensure the provision of services until a new contract is granted.

105 It may therefore be necessary, in respect of particularly important services, to conclude contracts in order better to safeguard the continuity, regularity and quality of the service.

106 What should one make of those arguments?

107 At first sight, the wording of Article 4(1) of the Regulation suggests that it offers an alternative, since it provides that `a Member State may conclude public service contracts... or (10) impose public service obligations'. That said, it is true that the term `or' (`ou') can also be inclusive in meaning and there is still, therefore, room for doubt.

108 Nor is the definition of a `public service contract' in Article 2 of the Regulation such as to lend absolute certainty. That definition makes it clear that such a contract is concluded `in order to provide the public with adequate transport services'. The most one can infer from this, as the national court does, moreover, is that if, by means of concluding a contract, adequate services are provided, further intervention by the authorities, such as the imposition of public service obligations, is no longer necessary and is, therefore, an unjustified restriction on the freedom to provide services which the Regulation seeks to establish.

109 The definition referred to does not imply, however, that the adequacy of the services provided arises from existence of the contract alone. Of itself, the definition in no way precludes the contract from being additional to public service obligations, in such a way that use of both mechanisms concurrently enables adequate services to be guaranteed.

110 The list in Article 2(3) of the Regulation also, to an extent, supports that possibility, since the matters which may be covered by the contract include `additional transport services'. From that viewpoint, the contract is, as the French and Spanish Governments and the Commission maintain, with the qualifications already noted, a mechanism which is additional to public service obligations and intended to supplement the arrangements of which those obligations form the basis.

111 Lastly, one can also cite in support of the same argument the ninth recital in the preamble to the Regulation, which reads, let us recall, as follows:

`[w]hereas the introduction of public services (11) entailing certain rights and obligations for the shipowners concerned may be justified in order to ensure the adequacy of regular transport services (12) to, from and between islands, provided that there is no distinction on the grounds of nationality or residence'.

112 One can deduce from that wording that the aim pursued by the legislature, in permitting recourse to the public service concept, is to ensure the adequacy of services, and that the only condition which it imposes in that respect is that there be no discrimination.

113 The wording of Article 4 also seems to me to confirm the fact that non-discrimination is the only condition imposed. Article 4(1) states that `[w]henever a Member State concludes public service contracts ... it shall do so on a non-discriminatory basis in respect of all Community shipowners'. The second subparagraph of Article 4(2) provides, furthermore, that `[w]here applicable, any compensation for public service obligations must be available to all Community shipowners'.

114 I consider, accordingly, that it is possible to combine public service obligations and conclusion of a contract, provided that this does not give rise to either discrimination or distortion of competition between shipowners.

115 The foregoing means first of all that, from the time the Member State concludes with a shipowner a contract ensuring adequate services on a specific route and giving rise to a subsidy, public service obligations can no longer be imposed on maritime shipping companies serving the same line.

116 In other words, public service obligations relating to the continuity, regularity, capacity and quality of transport cannot be imposed on all companies, whilst only the company with which a contract has been or is being concluded is granted financial compensation in respect of the same obligations.

117 On the other hand, the issue would be different if the company with which a contract is concluded were granted financial compensation in respect of services which it provides in addition to those required, as public service obligations, of all companies, such as additional services during the winter season.

118 None the less, a contract concluded with one company alone in order to ensure certain additional services cannot give rise to subsidies giving that company a financial advantage such as to enable it to offer all its services at a price which would protect it from competition from other operators (cross-subsidies).

119 In other words, combined use of both mechanisms on a single maritime route is acceptable only if, first, the same public service obligations are imposed on all companies, including the contract-holder, and, second, the contract-holder assumes, additionally, supplementary liabilities for which it is remunerated in strict proportion to those liabilities. Such remuneration must not have the effect of giving it a competitive advantage in respect of all its activities.

120 The Commission expressed the same view, stating that public service obligations imposed in the context of a general system must in any event be less onerous than those required by a public service contract, so as not to distort competition between operators. Public service obligations must also be imposed on the basis of transparency and non-discrimination, with no exercise of discretion. Public service contracts, for their part, must be concluded on the basis of a public call for tenders ensuring equal treatment and equal chances of success for all operators.

121 I propose, therefore, that the Court reply to the third question as follows:

`Article 4(1) of the Regulation must be interpreted as permitting public service obligations to be imposed on some shipping companies and, at the same time, a public service contract within the meaning of Article 2(3) of the Regulation to be concluded with another company for the same line or route, provided that the public service contract includes liabilities in addition to the public service obligations imposed on all companies, that the financial compensation granted is proportionate to those liabilities and that it is not, accordingly, such as to distort competition to the detriment of companies which are not parties to such a contract.'

Conclusion

122 I propose that the Court reply as follows to the questions referred by the Tribunal Supremo:

`(1) Article 1 and Article 4(2) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 3577/92 of 7 December 1992 applying the principle of freedom to provide services to maritime transport within Member States (maritime cabotage) must be interpreted as not permitting the provision of island cabotage services by undertakings covering regular shipping lines to be made subject to prior administrative authorisation, unless the Member State can demonstrate that:

- in an environment of free competition the public service could not be ensured, in an adequate manner, on the lines subject to authorisation;

- operators' compliance with public service obligations can be supervised only by means of a system of prior authorisation;

- the conditions for issue of the authorisation are defined, predictable, transparent and non-discriminatory;

- operators who satisfy the public service obligations set by the Member State are automatically granted authorisation.

(2) Article 4(2) of Regulation No 3577/92 does not preclude the grant or continuation of the authorisation referred to in the first question being made subject to the condition that the service provider have no outstanding tax or social security debts, provided that this condition is applied on a non-discriminatory basis.

(3) Article 4(1) of Regulation No 3577/92 must be interpreted as permitting public service obligations to be imposed on some shipping companies and, at the same time, a public service contract within the meaning of Article 2(3) of that regulation to be concluded with another company for the same line or route, provided that the public service contract includes liabilities in addition to the public service obligations imposed on all companies, that the financial compensation granted is proportionate to those liabilities and that it is not, accordingly, such as to distort competition to the detriment of companies which are not parties to such a contract.'

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 12 October 2000.
Oy Liikenne Ab v Pekka Liskojärvi and Pentti Juntunen.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Korkein oikeus - Finland.
Directive 77/187/EEC - Safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings - Directive 92/50/EEC - Public service contracts - Non-maritime public transport services.
Case C-172/99.

1. The Korkein Oikeus (Finnish Supreme Court) seeks a preliminary ruling on the question whether the provisions of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses, are applicable in the case of a takeover of the operation of seven regional bus lines by a legal person governed by private law, subsequent to a procedure for the award of a public service contract conducted in accordance with the procedures laid down by Directive 92/50/EEC.

I Legal background

2. According to Article 1(1), Directive 77/187 applies to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger.

3. Article 2 defines the principal terms used. It states at point (a) that transferor means any natural or legal person who, by reason of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), ceases to be the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business. Point (b) defines transferee as any natural or legal person who, by reason of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), becomes the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business.

4. As is stated in its twentieth recital, Directive 92/50 aims to improve the access of service providers to procedures for the award of contracts with a view to eliminating practices that restrict competition in general and participation in contracts by other Member States' nationals in particular.

5. Article 1(a) of that Directive defines public service contracts as contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority. Article 1(b) provides that contracting authorities means the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law.

6. Article 3(1) of Directive 92/50 states that In awarding public service contracts or in organising design contests, contracting authorities shall apply procedures adapted to the provisions of this Directive. Article 3(2) provides that Contracting authorities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.

7. By virtue of Annex 1A, referred to in Article 8, Directive 92/50 applies inter alia to land transport services.

II Facts and procedure

8. Following a call for tenders, the Pääkaupunkiseudun Yhteistyövaltuuskunta (Greater Helsinki Joint Board, hereinafter YTV) awarded, for a period of three years, the operation of seven regional bus routes, previously operated by Hakunilan Liikenne Oy (hereinafter Hakunilan Liikenne), to Oy Liikenne Ab (hereinafter Liikenne).

9. Hakunilan Liikenne, which operated those routes with 26 buses, then dismissed 45 drivers. Liikenne reengaged 33 of them, who had applied to work with that company. They also employed 18 other drivers. The 33 former Hakunilan Liikenne drivers were reengaged on terms applying under the national collective agreement for the sector, which were as a whole less favourable than those which applied at Hakunilan

Liikenne.

10. The passage of the operation from Hakunilan Liikenne to Liikenne did not involve any transfer of vehicles or other assets relating to the operation of the bus routes in question. While waiting for delivery of 22 new buses which it had ordered, Liikenne leased two buses from Hakunilan Liikenne for a period of two or three months, and purchased from the latter the uniforms of some of the drivers who had transferred to its employment.

11. Mr Liskojärvi and Mr Juntunen are two of the 33 drivers who were dismissed by Hakunilan Liikenne and reengaged by Liikenne. As they considered that there had been a transfer of a business between the two companies and that they were accordingly entitled to continue to enjoy the conditions of employment in force at their former employer, they brought proceedings against Liikenne in the Vantaan Käräjäoikeus (Vantaa District Court). Liikenne, for its part, denied that any transfer had taken place.

12. By judgment dated 17 June 1996, the Vantaan Käräjäoikeus held in favour of Mr Liskojärvi and Mr Juntunen. The Helsingen Hovoikeus (Helsinki Court of Appeal), by judgment of 23 October 1997, rejected Liikenne's appeal, and the latter then appealed to the Korkein Oikeus.

13. In its referral for a preliminary ruling the Korkein Oikeus observes that the concept of the transfer of a business remains unclear, particularly where, as in the present case, the transfer is not based on a contract between the parties and there is no transfer of significant assets. The court also points out that the case involves a tender procedure conducted in accordance with Directive 92/50. However, the application of Directive 77/187 in such a context, if it is to protect the rights of employees, may restrict competition between undertakings and prejudice the effectiveness of Directive 92/50. The Korkein Oikeus accordingly seeks guidance as to how the two directives should be reconciled.

14. As it considered that the resolution of the case depended on the interpretation of Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187, the Korkein Oikeus, by its order of 27 April 1999, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court:

Is a situation in which the operation of bus routes passes from one bus undertaking to another as a consequence of a tender procedure under Directive 92/50/EEC on public service contracts to be regarded as a transfer of a business for the purposes of Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187/EEC?

III The question referred for a preliminary ruling

Introductory observations

15. By the question referred, the national court seeks to know if the provisions of Directive 77/187 are applicable in the context of Directive 92/50. It is also clear from the terms of the question referred that the doubts of the national court were sustained by two distinct but complementary problems.

16. The national court observes first of all that the aims of Directive 92/50 do not seem capable of being reconciled with those of Directive 77/187. It therefore asks the Court whether a transaction effected in the context of Directive 92/50 which leads to the transfer of a commercial activity previously carried out by one undertaking to another is in principle covered by Directive 77/187.

17. If the Court's answer to the first question is in the affirmative, the national court seeks an answer to a second question relating to the conditions in which Directive 77/187 applies. This second question can be subdivided into two points.

18. First, the Finnish court asks the Court to say whether the concept of legal transfer referred to in Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 necessarily requires that there be a direct contractual relationship between the transferor and the transferee.

19. Secondly, the national court asks whether it should be held that there is a transfer of an undertaking in terms of the Directive when there has been no significant transfer of assets between the transferor and the transferee.

20. I shall examine the two questions posed by the national court in turn.

Answer to the first question

21. I am in agreement with the majority of the participants in the case, that the answer to the first question should be in the affirmative, as much by reason of the wording of the Directives in question as by their objectives.

22. According to Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50, public service contracts are defined as contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority.

23. In terms of Annex 1A, referred to in Article 8, land transport services are covered by Directive 92/50.

24. It follows from the wording of those provisions that the taking over of land transport activities following a tender procedure for the award of a public service contract requires entry into a contract for pecuniary interest between a contracting authority and a service provider.

25. Under Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187, the transfer of the undertaking concerned must be the result of a legal transfer or merger. The directive does not expressly specify any other condition relating to the parties to the transaction. As I shall explain below, the absence of a direct contractual link between the transferor and transferee is not in principle a matter which will exclude the application of Directive 77/187.

26. Reading these provisions together allows one therefore to state that a transaction to which Directive 92/50 applies may be covered by Directive 77/187 if the other conditions laid down by the latter directive are fulfilled.

27. The national court observes, however, that the object of Directive 77/187 is to protect the rights of employees, whereas Directive 92/50 aims to guarantee the principle of freedom of competition in the context of the award of public service contracts. The national court considers that to apply Directive 77/187 may restrict competition between undertakings and prejudice the effectiveness of Directive 92/50. According to the national court, The making of an offer in a public contract procedure and the effectiveness of the procedure may be influenced by the fact that the amount of expenditure arising from employees who may transfer and other costs cannot be ascertained beforehand.

28. I do not consider that these two directives are incompatible by reason of their objectives.

29. Directive 92/50 aims to eliminate practices which are an obstacle to competition between service providers and to participation in the markets of other Member States.

30. In order to achieve this, the directives require the implementation of uniformly applicable rules throughout the Community by all economic entities.

31. In parallel, Directive 77/187 has the objective of ensuring the protection of the workforce in transfers of undertakings, by guaranteeing the continuity of the contractual relations which exist in the context of an economic entity independently of any change in its ownership.

32. The concern expressed by the national court that the application of Directive 77/187 in the context of a tender procedure would call into question the purpose of Directive 92/50 does not seem to me to be well-founded.

33. The aim of Directive 92/50 is not to permit the takeover of economic entities to the detriment of the rights of their workforce but to place those service providers who wish to compete for the award of a contract in equal competitive conditions.

34. Once an offer is accepted, the successful tenderer is required to respect the rights of the workforce in the manner laid down by the Directive. The application of the same rules, whatever the status and nationality of the competing service providers, cannot thereby have the result that they are placed in unequal competitive conditions. On the contrary, it obliges them to observe those same rules. Consequently, it allows equal treatment of the latter.

35. I am not convinced by the argument which states that the principle of legal certainty is opposed to the application of the provisions of Directive 77/187 in the context of Directive 92/50. Before submitting an offer, tenderers know whether, in order to provide the service in respect of which they are competing, they need to acquire the tangible or intangible assets of the undertaking which has been operating the contract until then, or whether they require to take over the whole or a part of the workforce of that undertaking. Equally, they know that, if they proceed to take over the essential elements of the transferred entity which are necessary to the functioning of its activities, a transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of Article 1(1) of the Directive will arise. In such a case, they will build this information into their costing assumptions when fixing the level of their offer.

36. A reading of Directive 77/187 which allows for its application in the context of Directive 92/50 thus ensures not only the respect of the rules of equal competition for all the participants in the exercise, but also guarantees the rights of employees, who are not to be prejudiced by the change of employer by reason of the transfer of the undertaking. Such a reading will therefore fully reconcile the objectives of Directive 77/187 with those of Directive 92/50.

37. On the other hand, to hold that Directive 77/187 is inapplicable for the simple reason that Directive 92/50 applies would do harm to the objective of the protection of workers in the context of the transfer of an undertaking covered by Directive 77/187 and would not properly meet the objectives of Directive 92/50. The aim of this directive is, as I have mentioned, to guarantee the application of rules of equal competition among economic operators. It does not in any way require Member States to prejudice the rights of the workforce.

38. Accordingly, I am of the view that this interpretation cannot be accepted by the Court.

39. As the national court has described the facts of this case, the activity was transferred as a result of a contract for pecuniary interest entered into between a contracting authority and a tenderer and that activity consists in the provision of land transport services. Such an arrangement is covered in principle by Directive 77/187.

40. It follows from the foregoing that the provisions of Directive 77/187 may be applicable in the context of Directive 92/50 if the other conditions stipulated by Directive 77/187 apply, and I shall examine this point below.

Answer to the second question

41. The national court asks the Court of Justice to give further guidance as to the conditions in which Directive 77/187 applies. It asks first if there is a legal transfer, within the meaning of Article 1(1) of the Directive, where, by reason of the taking over of economic activities by a tenderer under Directive 92/50, no contract has been entered into between the tenderer and the former employer. It wishes next to know whether it should be held that there has been a transfer of an undertaking, again within the meaning of Article 1(1), where there has been no transfer of significant assets between the tenderer and the previous employer.

(a) The concept of a legal transfer

42. I recently addressed this matter in another case before the Court. I took the view, in light of the aims of the Directive, that the concept should be given a sufficiently wide interpretation to meet the purpose for which the Directive was enacted.

43. I pointed out that the Court had consistently taken the view that the determining factor for establishing whether there had been a legal transfer for the purposes of the Directive was that there be a change of the person legal or natural, governed by private law or public law responsible for the operation of the undertaking which enters into the relationship of employer with the employees of the undertaking taken over. It was my view that the absence of any direct contractual link between the two undertakings successively having the character of employer towards the workforce could not in itself remove from the latter their rights under the Directive.

44. In the Mayeur case, the Court confirmed its previous approach. It held that While the lack of a contractual link between the transferor and the transferee may point to the absence of a transfer within the meaning of Directive 77/187, it cannot be conclusive in that regard. The Court also explained that Directive 77/187 is applicable wherever, in the context of contractual relations, there is a change in the natural or legal person who is responsible for carrying on the business and who thereby incurs the obligations of an employer towards the employees of the undertaking.

45. In the present case, it is an accepted fact that there was no direct contractual link between Hakunilan Liikenne and Liikenne, but that the latter took over in their entirety the operations previously undertaken by Hakunilan Liikenne. It is also accepted that this takeover was possible only through a contract for a pecuniary interest, in this case a concession, between Liikenne, a legal person governed by private law, and YTV, a legal person governed by public law.

46. This factual situation is similar to that which arose in the Hidalgo case. There, as in Mayeur, the Court held that While the absence of a contractual link î between the two undertakings which were successive beneficiaries of a concession [let by a municipality, being a legal person governed by public law] in relation to a home-help service or entrusted with the task of managing a sewage works, may serve to indicate that there has been no transfer in the sense of Directive 77/187, but is not determinative in this regard.

47. It follows from the above that the fact that no direct contractual link exists between two undertakings who were successive beneficiaries of a concession, granted following a public service contract award procedure under Directive 92/50, in relation to land transport (in this case the operation of regional bus routes) by a legal person governed by public law does not prevent Directive 77/187 from applying where the other conditions laid down by that directive are fulfilled.

(b) The concept of transfer of an undertaking

48. The Court has consistently held that The decisive test for establishing the existence of a transfer within the meaning of Directive 77/187 is whether the entity in question retains its identity [after the transfer has taken place].

49. In order to clarify this requirement, the Court explained that The mere fact î that the activity engaged in by the old and the new employer is similar does not justify the conclusion that an economic entity has been transferred. Its identity also emerges from other factors, such as its workforce, its managerial staff, the way in which its work is organised, its operating methods or indeed, where appropriate, the operational resources available to it. In the Court's opinion, the term economic entity refers to an organised grouping of persons and assets facilitating the exercise of an economic activity which pursues a specific objective.

50. Two conditions must therefore apply in order for the identity of the undertaking to have been maintained after the transfer.

51. First, the transferee must carry on the same economic activity as was carried on by the transferor before the transfer, or a similar activity. This first condition can be defined as identity of the activity.

52. Secondly, there must have been the transfer of the means necessary to undertake the activity in question, or of the means required to operate it, having regard to the nature of the entity transferred. This second condition can be defined as identity of the entity.

53. In order to establish whether these conditions have been met, regard must be had to the facts of the case. That is clearly a matter for the court adjudicating on the substance of the matter and not one for this Court. This has been stated on numerous occasions, notably in the recent case of Mayeur.

54. Nevertheless, with a view to assisting the national court in its task, the Court has specified a number of factual circumstances which may be taken into account by the national court in establishing whether the transaction in question is to be treated as the transfer of an undertaking.

55. These circumstances comprise in particular the type of undertaking or business, whether or not its tangible assets, such as buildings and movable property, are transferred, the value of its intangible assets at the time of the transfer, whether or not the majority of its employees are taken over by the new employer, whether or not its goodwill is transferred, the degree of similarity between the activities carried on before and after the transfer, and the period, if any, for which those activities are suspended.

56. In order to provide further assistance to the national court in carrying out this task, the Court has given directions as to the line of enquiry to be followed by the national court.

57. The Court has stated that However, those circumstances are merely single factors in the overall assessment which must be made and cannot therefore be considered in isolation.

58. The Court has furthermore pointed out that in fulfilling its role, the national court must assess the degree of importance to be given to the various elements of the transaction, having regard to all the circumstances and must take into account the type of undertaking or business transferred, having regard in particular to the sector of activity in which it operates. The national court must therefore determine which are the essential and indispensable elements required in order for the economic entity to carry on operating and establish whether these elements have been taken over by the transferee.

59. Although the Court has held in principle that for an economic entity to exist there should be an identifiable group of workers and significant tangible or intangible assets, it has nonetheless accepted that such an entity may function even in the absence of any assets belonging to the undertaking which formerly carried on the business. In particular, the Court has found to this effect in the case of certain sectors such as cleaning and security.

60. If it is accepted that, in certain sectors, an economic entity may exist without having significant assets, tangible or intangible, the maintenance of its identity following the transfer affecting it cannot, logically, depend on the transfer of such assets. That point was made by the Court in the Süzen case.

61. It is clear, and this point was accepted by all parties participating in these proceedings, that the activity carried on by the successive undertakings in the present case represented the same economic activity. It consisted of the operation of seven regional bus routes. The first condition required by the Court's case law, namely that of identity of economic activity, is therefore met.

62. The participants are, however, not in agreement as to whether the second condition, namely the identity of the entity, is met.

63. It is accepted that the majority of the workforce of the undertaking were taken over by Liikenne. It is also clear that Liikenne's succession to the activity carried on by Hakunilan Liikenne did not involve any transfer of the assets used in connection with the operation of the seven bus routes in question.

64. In order to answer this question it is necessary for the national court to proceed in accordance with the approach laid down by the Court of Justice.

65. First of all, it should consider all the circumstances which characterise the operation in question. To do this, it should have regard to the fact that the takeover of the activity did not involve any transfer of tangible assets, but that, on the other hand, the majority of the personnel engaged in carrying on the activity prior to the transfer were reengaged by the successful tenderer. It should also have regard to the specific nature of the undertaking involved in the transfer, that is to say to the fact that it consisted of an undertaking which operated regional bus routes. It may also take other matters into account. For example, it should decide whether the customer base as a whole was taken over by Liikenne and determine the economic value of this element of the immovable assets in the context of the activity transferred.

66. Secondly, the national court will have to assess the respective importance to be given to these separate elements. In order to do this, it should form a view as to what characterises, or what distinguishes, the economic entity which was the subject of the operation in question, in this case the bus operations carried on by Hakunilan Liikenne and then by Liikenne.

67. The Commission is of the view that the workforce is the key element of the service offered in this case, namely bus transport. The buses, which ultimately were not taken over by Liikenne, were accessory to the exercise. In the final analysis, the Commission considers that bus transport is an activity which is fundamentally based on manpower.

68. It is not appropriate for the Court of Justice to substitute its view for that of the national court, which is the sole judge of the question whether, in the present case, the economic entity has kept its identity following the transfer. Replying to that question necessarily involves a purely factual assessment of a particular situation. However, I consider that the national court's attention should be drawn to the following points.

69. Unlike the Commission, I do not think that the key element of an economic entity such as a transport undertaking which operates regional bus routes is its workforce. In my view, the essential element, without which such an economic entity is incapable of functioning normally, consists in principle in its fleet lorries, cars, buses ... and not in its workforce.

70. Furthermore, it is appropriate to point out to the national court that this Court has consistently held that in principle the concept of an economic entity presupposes the existence not only of a workforce but also of tangible and intangible assets. The Court has equally consistently taken the view that, in specific cases, the fact that an economic entity has no assets and is essentially characterised by its workforce does not prevent the Directive from applying even in the absence of any transfer of assets. The conclusion to be reached, therefore, is that where an undertaking comprises significant assets which are indispensable to its operation, the absence of any transfer of those assets means that it is in principle wrong to hold that the provisions of Article 1(1) of the Directive apply.

71. It follows from the above that, where the economic entity which transfers its activity possesses significant assets, the principle that the absence of any transfer of those assets by the transferor to the transferee would preclude application of the provisions of Directive 77/187 has been laid down by the Court.

72. In my view, to follow the reasoning of the Commission would render this principle devoid of any useful effect.

73. That is why I am of the view that the Commission's argument in its submissions to the Court is not in accordance with the interpretation which the Court has given to the Directive, nor with the economic reality of the entity in question in this case.

74. It follows from the above that the absence of a transfer of significant assets from a regional bus transport undertaking to another undertaking carrying on the same type of business does not support a conclusion that Directive 77/187 is applicable.

Conclusion

75. In view of the consideration set forth above, I propose that the Court answer the questions put by the Korkein Oikeus as follows:

(1) The takeover by an undertaking which is a legal person governed by private law of land transport activities, consisting in the present case of the operation of regional bus routes, previously carried on by another undertaking which was a legal person governed by private law, following a procedure for the award of a public service contract Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts may fall within the scope of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses, as defined by Article 1(1) of that Directive.

(2) Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 is to be interpreted to the effect that:

(a) it may apply in the absence of a direct contractual link between two undertakings to whom there has been successively granted, following a procedure for the award of a public service contract under Directive 92/50, a concession for the operation of a land transport service (in this case, the operation of regional bus routes) by a legal person governed by public law;

(b) it does not apply in the absence of a transfer of significant assets between the two undertakings.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 15 June 2000.
ARGE Gewässerschutz v Bundesministerium für Land- und Forstwirtschaft.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public service contracts - Directive 92/50/EEC - Procedure for the award of public procurement contracts - Equal treatment of tenderers - Discrimination on grounds of nationality - Freedom to provide services.
Case C-94/99.

1 In accordance with national legislation on water quality, a number of Austrian administrative authorities invited tenders for the award of service contracts for the taking and the analysis of water samples from Austrian lakes and rivers.

2 The fact that bodies benefiting from subsidies took part in the tender procedure alongside strictly private tenderers gave rise to a dispute which led the Austrian court in the main proceedings to refer to the Court of Justice a number of questions for a preliminary ruling.

Basically, those questions concern the legality, under Community law, of a public contract award procedure to which subsidised bodies were admitted, all of which have the nationality of the Member State of the contracting authority and are established in the territory of that Member State.

3 The questions raised by the invitation to tender at issue concern the principle of equality in two ways.

It is necessary to establish whether the fact that subsidised bodies were allowed to submit tenders is likely to infringe the principle of non-discrimination on the ground of nationality or, at the very least, to create an obstacle to the freedom to provide services, since all the bodies concerned are Austrian.

Even assuming that no restriction on trade can be identified, it is important to determine whether the advantage over the other tenderers which these bodies are able to enjoy as a result of the public funding they are accorded is compatible with the aim of securing effective competition pursued by Directive 92/50/EEC. (1)

I - The Directive

4 The aim of the Directive is to coordinate the procedures for the award of public service contracts. In so doing, it contributes to the gradual establishment of the internal market, defined as an area without internal frontiers in which the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital is ensured. (2)

5 More particularly, the Directive is designed to meet the need to avoid obstacles to the free movement of services. (3) It is justified by the need to improve the access of service providers to procedures for the award of contracts in order to eliminate practices that restrict competition in general and participation in contracts by other Member States' nationals in particular. (4)

6 According to Article 3(1) and (2):

`1. In awarding public service contracts or in organising design contests, contracting authorities shall apply procedures adapted to the provisions of this Directive.

2. Contracting authorities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.'

7 Article 6 sets out an exception to the application of the Directive. It states that:

`This Directive shall not apply to public service contracts awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision which is compatible with the Treaty.'

8 Article 37 of the Directive lays down certain obligations with which the contracting authority must comply if it intends to reject abnormally low tenders. The first paragraph of Article 37 is worded as follows:

`If, for a given contract, tenders appear to be abnormally low in relation to the service provided, the contracting authority shall, before it may reject those tenders, request in writing details of the constituent elements of the tender which it considers relevant and shall verify those constituent elements taking account of the explanations received.'

II - The facts and the main proceedings

9 Acting on the basis of the powers they hold under the Austrian system of indirect federal administration, the Offices of the Governments of the Provinces of Salzburg, Lower Austria, Upper Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Tyrol and Burgenland, as well as the Landeswasserbauamt (Water Authority) of the Province of Vorarlberg held an open procedure for the award of contracts for the taking and analysis of samples for the observation years 1998/1999 and 1999/2000, in accordance with the Wassergüte-Erhebungsverordnung (5) (Water Quality Survey Regulations).

10 ARGE Gewässerschutz, (6) an association of companies and civil engineers, and other bodies, including the Osterreichische Forschungszentrum Seibersdorf GmbH (7) and the Osterreichische Forschungs- und Prüfungszentrum Arsenal GmbH, (8) submitted tenders in the course of that procedure.

11 ARGE considered that the subsidies enjoyed by the latter tenderers gave them competitive advantages and created an obstacle to trade between the Member States, and successfully applied for an arbitration procedure to be carried out before the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Procurement Review Commission), in accordance with the Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Law on Public Procurement Contracts).

12 The Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission took the view that federal law did not preclude the participation of bodies supported by public funds or of bodies governed by public law, such as research institutes and university institutes, as tenderers in award procedures alongside other private tenderers.

13 ARGE then applied for a review by the Bundesvergabeamt.

III - The questions referred

14 Considering that an interpretation of Community law was required to settle the dispute, the Bundesvergabeamt decided to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

`1. Does the decision of a contracting authority to admit to an award procedure bodies which receive subsidies of any kind, either from the authority itself or from other contracting authorities, which enable those bodies to tender in an award procedure at prices which are substantially below those of their commercially active competitors, infringe the principle of equal treatment of all tenderers and candidates in an award procedure?

2. Does the decision of the contracting body to admit such bodies to an award procedure constitute covert discrimination, if the bodies which receive such subsidies without exception have the nationality of, or are established in, the Member State in which the contracting authority is also established?

3. Does the decision of a contracting authority to admit such bodies to an award procedure, even on the assumption that it does not discriminate against the other tenderers and candidates, constitute a restriction of the freedom to provide services which is not compatible with the provisions of the EC Treaty, in particular Article 59 et seq. thereof?

4. May the contracting authority conclude service contracts with bodies which are exclusively or at least predominantly in public ownership and provide their services exclusively or at least predominantly to the contracting authority or other State institutions, without making the service the subject of an award procedure in competition with commercially active tenderers in accordance with Directive 92/50/EEC?'

IV - Preliminary observations

15 The first three questions for a preliminary ruling relate, as I have said, to the principle of equality, in terms of both discrimination on grounds of nationality (the second and third questions) and discrimination between tenderers in receipt of subsidies and the other tenderers (the first question).

16 The fourth question concerns the scope of the Directive ratione personae. It is necessary to establish whether the Directive is applicable to contracts for the provision of services concluded between a contracting authority and a service provider which is in a relationship of close dependence with a public authority because that authority is both its principal owner and the main recipient of its services.

17 It is appropriate to begin by analysing the second and third questions together, given that they both relate to Treaty provisions, namely Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 49 EC) and the following articles, concerning the freedom to provide services.

18 I shall then discuss the fourth question, concerning the scope of the Directive, and thereafter consider the first question which deals with the principle of equal treatment of tenderers, as set out in the Directive.

V - Is the freedom to provide services restricted (second and third questions)?

19 By these questions, the Bundesvergabeamt is asking whether Articles 59 et seq. of the Treaty have to be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a decision by a contracting authority to admit to a public contract award procedure bodies in receipt of public subsidies which enable them to submit tenders at prices substantially below the prices submitted by the other tenderers, where those bodies all have the nationality of the Member State in which the contracting authority is established and are established in the territory of that same Member State. (9)

20 The first paragraph of Article 59 of the Treaty provides that: `... restrictions on freedom to provide services within the Community shall be prohibited in respect of nationals of Member States who are established in a State of the Community other than that of the person for whom the services are intended.'

21 According to Article 59, which establishes the freedom to provide services, all discrimination against a person by reason of his nationality (10) or the fact that he is established in a Member State other than that in which the service is provided must be abolished. (11)

22 That rule is confirmed in the third paragraph of Article 60 of the EC Treaty (now the third paragraph of Article 50 EC). Applying the principle of national treatment to the free movement of services, it provides that `... the person providing a service may, in order to do so, temporarily pursue his activity in the State where the service is provided, under the same conditions as are imposed by that State on its own nationals.'

23 At issue is the fact that bodies like the Seibersdorf centre and the Arsenal institute, which are said to enjoy an unwarranted competitive advantage because of the subsidies they receive, were allowed to take part in the tender procedure. Both have close links with the Member State of the contracting authority since both are established in Austrian territory and are subject to Austrian law. (12)

24 To avoid any ambiguity in the interpretation of the questions referred, I should make it clear that the discriminatory factor mentioned in the second question does not relate to the circumstance that these subsidised bodies were allowed to take part in the award procedure. That issue is covered in the first question, which I shall consider later. As I have said, the problem is that the bodies benefiting from subsidy are all Austrian, and that might give the impression that subsidised operators from other Member States were not permitted to tender.

25 In that connection, the Bundesvergabeamt suggests that there may have been covert discrimination.

26 As we know, the principle of equal treatment, to which Article 59 gives specific expression, prohibits not only overt discrimination by reason of nationality but also all covert forms of discrimination which, by the application of other criteria of differentiation, lead in fact to the same result. (13)

27 The national court's reference to the possibility of covert discrimination indicates that it appears to harbour no doubt that the measure at issue does not involve overt discrimination, in so far as it stipulates no condition in respect of nationality or place of establishment, regardless of whether or not the bodies concerned are subsidised.

In the absence of any condition relating to nationality or place of establishment determining the right to respond to the invitation to tender, Austrian bodies or bodies located in Austrian territory would, however, still be at an advantage if the disputed measure treated tenderers differently by applying a criterion according to which only bodies subsidised by the Austrian authorities were allowed to take part in the award procedure.

28 As the Austrian Government has correctly pointed out, (14) there is a significant risk that a national rule reserving solely for bodies subsidised by the Austrian authorities the right to take part in award procedures would constitute a restriction on the freedom to provide services. Were that the case, that criterion would be disguising a difference in treatment between undertakings established, even if only in the form of branch offices, in Austrian territory, as they alone would be able to obtain subsidies from the public authorities, and the other undertakings. Foreign operators benefiting from subsidies would not be able to exploit that advantage to compete with Austrian operators in the same situation and improve their chances of winning contracts from the Austrian contracting authority.

29 In any event, whether the measure at issue is viewed in terms of direct discrimination or simply covert discrimination, the answer must be the same.

30 I do not consider it justified to conclude from the fact that all the subsidised bodies taking part in the award procedure have the same nationality as the contracting authority that the legality of the procedure at issue is necessarily flawed as a result of the application of discriminatory criteria.

31 The principle of non-discrimination does not in fact require that various operators of different nationality should, in all circumstances, be represented. It merely requires that there should be no obstacle to the exercise of free movement by economic operators, regardless of their place of origin within the Community.

32 I therefore consider that the decision to allow subsidised bodies of Austrian nationality to take part is not sufficient to establish discrimination by reason of the nationality or place of establishment of the tenderers or the source of the subsidies they receive.

33 For discrimination of that kind to be established, it would be necessary to prove that, de jure or de facto, the award procedure includes a rule whereby the right of economic operators to take part in the procedure is subject to a criterion of nationality or the location of their registered office in Austrian territory.

34 Similarly, it would have to be established that admission to the tender procedure is dependent on the subsidised bodies obtaining their subsidies from the Austrian authorities.

35 However, even though there is no reference at any point to participation by a tenderer of a different nationality, established in the territory of another Member State and benefiting from subsidies accorded by authorities other than the Austrian authorities, it does not appear that the procedure at issue lays down criteria which permit such operators to be excluded from it.

36 More particularly, I have not identified any factor to suggest that the measure at issue includes a condition whereby the subsidies received may be accorded only by the Austrian authorities. Subject to confirmation of that point by the Bundesvergabeamt, (15) the fact that only subsidised Austrian bodies took part must be attributed to factors other than the applicable law and practice.

37 It is clear that if the national court were to determine the existence of a condition of that kind, it would have to draw the appropriate conclusions in terms of the legality of the procedure and set aside that condition as being incompatible with Community law.

38 I should add that, if the measure at issue is not discriminatory, it is hard to see how the decision to admit the subsidised bodies restricts the freedom to provide services, as a national of another Member State which is subsidised by that State is in any case entitled to tender in the same way as the other operators.

39 It must therefore be concluded that Articles 59 et seq. of the Treaty have to be interpreted as meaning that they do not preclude a measure such as the decision at issue in the main proceedings, whereby a contracting authority has admitted to an award procedure bodies in receipt of public subsidies which enable them to tender at prices which are substantially below those of the other tenderers, even if all of those bodies have the nationality of the Member State in which the contracting authority is established and are established in the territory of that same Member State, provided no condition has been laid down in respect of the nationality of the operators, their place of establishment or the origin of the subsidies they may receive.

VI - The scope of the Directive: the contracts for the provision of services concluded between a contracting authority and a service provider dependent on contracting authorities (fourth question)

40 By its fourth question, the national court is asking whether the Directive has to be interpreted as meaning that it covers a service contract concluded between a contracting authority and a service provider where the service provider is predominantly owned by a contracting authority and provides services predominantly to contracting authorities, including the authority that owns it.

41 The Bundesvergabeamt refers to the possibility of excluding from the requirements of the Directive contractual relations between a contracting authority and bodies wholly owned by it which provide their services exclusively to it. However, it considers that those conditions are too restrictive and that, in functional terms, a service provider and a contracting authority may be treated as the same, even if the contracting authority does not have exclusive ownership of the service provider and is not the exclusive recipient of its activity. In that case too, the close relationship between contracting authority and service provider would justify their contractual relationship falling outside the scope of the Directive.

A - Admissibility

42 As both ARGE and the Austrian Government indicated in their written observations, the admissibility of this question may be a matter of debate. It is not apparent from the reference for a preliminary ruling that the applicability of the Directive to the procedure for the award of the public contract was called in question before the Austrian court.

43 However, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions it submits to the Court. A request from the national court may be refused by the Court of Justice only where it is obvious that the interpretation of a Community rule or assessment of its validity which is sought bears no relation to the facts or purpose of the main action or if the Court of Justice does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to give a useful answer to the questions. (16)

44 It cannot be claimed here that the scope of the Directive has no bearing on the main proceedings. Were it to appear that, by their very nature, bodies such as the two subsidised tenderers fall outside the scope of the Directive, there would be nothing a priori to prevent the national court drawing from it, in accordance with and within the limits of the applicable national procedure, conclusions that might help resolve the dispute, for example, by replacing, of its own motion, the rule arising out of the Directive with other rules.

45 Moreover, as we shall see, the material in the file is sufficiently clear to allow us to establish the principles which the national court can apply in order to settle the dispute in the main proceedings.

46 That is why I consider it necessary to answer the question submitted, as that material stands, without taking into account the fact that, according to the case-file, there appears to be no argument likely to call into question the legal framework initially adopted for the selection by the contracting authority of a service provider.

47 It is therefore necessary to establish whether the Directive is applicable in this case.

B - The substance

48 According to the eighth recital of the Directive: `the provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts...'. According to Article 1(a), for the purposes of the Directive, and with the exception of certain contracts, public service contracts are contracts for pecuniary interest, concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority.

49 The legal relationship in the form of a contract between the service provider and the service recipient requires that they should be two legal persons possessing, as such, the capacity voluntarily to enter into an undertaking. Consequently, the service provider must possess certain attributes which demonstrate that, in the exercise of its economic activity, it is acting sufficiently independently of the public authority seeking its services.

In other words, as Advocate General Cosmas clearly pointed out in his Opinion in Teckal, (17) the co-contractor of a contracting authority ... must have real third-party status with respect to that authority, that is to say, it must be a separate person from the contracting authority. The Advocate General goes on to say that Community law, on public tenders, (18) `... does not require contracting authorities to observe the procedure ensuring effective competition between interested parties where the authorities concerned wish to assume responsibility themselves for the supply of the products they need.'

50 That is why services defined as `in-house' services, that is to say services supplied to a public authority by its own departments or departments which are dependent on - although organisationally separate from - it, do not fall within the scope of the Directive. (19)

51 In the abovementioned Teckal judgment, the Court of Justice was asked to decide whether the fact that a local authority has products supplied to it by a consortium of which it is a member must result in a tender procedure provided for under Directive 93/36/EEC.

52 In addition to analysing some of the legal conditions governing the applicability of Directive 93/36/EEC, such as whether the local authority had the status of a contracting authority and whether there was a contract for pecuniary interest, the Court examined the relationship between the contracting authority and its co-contractor.

53 Like Directive 92/50/EEC, Directive 93/36/EEC applies where the contracting authority is intending to enter into an agreement with an economic operator. In determining whether there was an agreement between these two, in fact separate, persons, the Court ruled that `it is, in principle sufficient, if the contract was concluded between, on the one hand, a local authority and, on the other, a person legally distinct from that local authority'. (20) However, the Court clarified this by pointing out that: `The position can be otherwise only in the case where the local authority exercises over the person concerned a control which is similar to that which it exercises over its own departments and, at the same time, that person carries out the essential part of its activities with the controlling local authority or authorities'. (21)

54 The basic criteria thus established are founded on the notion that the entity with which the contracting authority is concluding the contract is in fact independent of it. According to the judgment in Teckal, for the Directive to be applicable, that entity must be formally distinct from the contracting authority and independent of it in regard to decision-making. (22)

55 It is regrettable that these criteria are not more clearly defined. It is easy to imagine and identify the existence of a separate entity, since it is sufficient to establish that the economic operator is set up in a legal form different from that of the contracting authority. But it is less straightforward to gauge the degree of independence the entity enjoys. The nature of the control a local authority exercises over a legally separate body or the level at which it may reasonably be assumed that the latter carries out the essential part of its activities with the public authority on which it depends, in particular, may be a source of real uncertainty.

56 It should, however, be borne in mind that there are many tests which make it possible to establish whether an entity is in fact independent. Since the national court alone is in possession of all the matters of fact and law relevant to the solution of the dispute before it and it is for that court to apply Community law to the dispute, the national court itself is best-placed to determine most accurately the freedom of action that operator enjoys in relation to the contracting authority.

57 At any event, the close links that exist between both the Seibersdorf centre and the Arsenal institute and the Austrian public authorities must be analysed in the light of these principles. That will enable us to determine whether those links reflect the kind of dependency which justifies them being given contracts to provide services involving the taking of samples and analysis of water quality, without having to comply with the provisions of the Directive.

1. Control by the contracting authority

58 As I have said, for a contract to fall outside the scope of the Directive, it is necessary to establish that the local authority exercises over the person concerned a control which is similar to that which it exercises over its own departments. (23)

59 If, in regard to an operator, the contracting authority exercises the same control as it exercises over its own departments, the tasks it is able to assign to that operator will be treated no differently than had they been simply delegated internally. The ability of the local authority to influence the way in which the service provider operates and the latter's consequent lack of autonomy mean that the contract concluded between the local authority and the service is not really a contract at all.

60 According to the Bundesvergabeamt, the research bodies at issue are predominantly owned by the

Austrian State or a Province. Their decision-making organs are appointed by the regional or local authority which owns them, or they are subject to supervision by one of those authorities. (24) ARGE, however, did not mention ownership by a Province. It stated that the Republic of Austria holds 50.5% of share capital in the Seibersdorf centre, the remaining 49.5% being held by private undertakings. According to ARGE, the Republic of Austria wholly owns the Arsenal institute. (25)

It is for the national court to consider in detail the evidence available to it. I make the general assumption that in both cases, at the very least, the State has predominant economic ownership, bearing in mind also the additional information provided by ARGE.

61 As regards the Arsenal institute, I would cite and apply to this case the analysis made by Advocate General Alber in his Opinion in RI.SAN., cited above, in which he states that: `even without a full knowledge of the internal organisation of GEPI SpA, it may be... concluded from the fact that the Italian State holds 100% of its share capital that the company is part of the Italian State in that respect'. (26)

62 The position of the Seibersdorf centre is less clear-cut. It is important to assess the degree of autonomy the centre is able to retain in relation to the State, despite being in predominantly public ownership.

63 In order to do this, the national court will assess the validity of ARGE's contention that despite being in predominantly public ownership, the action of that operator is determined by its private shareholders. (27) It is in fact for the national court to ascertain the number and nature of the posts held by representatives of the private operators on the centre's decision-making bodies and determine the extent to which that distribution of powers influences, under the applicable national law, the economic objectives of the Seibersdorf centre.

64 However, that assessment is necessary only if, in accordance with its own national law, the national court considers that the fact that - in its own words - these `bodies... are exclusively or at least predominantly in public ownership' (28) is not sufficient to guarantee that the public entity exercises effective control over the bodies it owns.

65 In any event, it is not enough to show that the bodies are of public origin. In order to provide the Bundesvergabeamt with a helpful answer, it is essential to make sure that the public authority which exercises control over the research bodies in the main proceedings and the contracting authority are one and the same person.

66 The reservation expressed in the judgment in Teckal is based on the principle that if an economic entity is not independent of the local authority that owns it, the existence of a contract between the two is impossible or illusory, even though they are legally separate. For a legal relationship to fall outside the scope of the Directive, therefore, the contracting authority which is seeking the provision of various services from the operator must in fact be the very local authority that closely controls it, and not another authority.

67 On the other hand, a contractual relationship between a public authority and a service provider that is not in any way subordinate to it does fall within the scope of the Directive, even if that service provider is owned by another public authority.

68 It would appear from the case-file that the Republic of Austria is the majority shareholder in both research bodies, whereas the contracting authority is made up of the Federal Provinces and a specialist authority (the Landeswasserbauamt of Vorarlberg).

In those circumstances, it is for the Bundesvergabeamt to decide whether, although these public authorities are separate, the Seibersdorf centre and Arsenal institute may none the less be subject, under national law, to the same kind of control by the local authorities that make up the contracting authority as those authorities exercise over their own departments.

69 The Directive is applicable if, on the basis of its findings, the national court decides that the relationship between the research bodies and the contracting authority does not indicate the exercise of any control by the latter, within the meaning of the judgment in Teckal.

70 If it emerges that the contracting authority does in fact exercise control, other criteria will have to be considered. This is not the sole criterion according to which the activity of the bodies concerned may be defined as `in-house' services. Simply establishing the existence of structural dependence in relation to the local authority that is to award a public contract is not of itself sufficient to make the services provided by the bodies in question comparable to the services that would be available to the local authority were it to use its own internal resources.

71 For that reason, it is also necessary to take into account the recipient of the economic activity those bodies engage in, applying the judgment in Teckal.

2. The recipient of the activity of the service provider

72 It is clear from the judgment in Teckal that an agreement cannot be considered to have been concluded between persons who are legally distinct if the operator carries out the essential part of its activity with the controlling local authority or authorities. (29)

73 As I have said, the principle set out in that judgment is based on the criterion that the operator is independent. An entity is not necessarily deprived of freedom of action simply because the decisions affecting it are taken by the local authority that controls it, if it is able to carry out a substantial part of its economic activity for other operators.

74 However, the entity must be considered to be wholly linked to the controlling authority if, in addition, the organisational relationship between the authority and the entity in question is coupled with the fact that the latter provides its services more or less exclusively to the authority. Such circumstances show that the local authority intends to use the services not just for public purposes but also, and principally, for its own benefit.

75 Only in that situation can it be argued that, administratively, the entity in question is an extension of the local authority, which is not therefore required to comply with the rules on competition laid down by the Directive, since it is opting to carry out itself the economic activities it requires.

76 Where a body acts essentially for the controlling public authority, the proprietorial relationship between the two entities justifies the provision of services by one to the other, in the same way as where an in-house department acts on behalf of the institution to which it belongs. On that basis, it seems justified that it should be exempt from the constraints of the Directive, since they are dictated by the need to maintain the kind of competition that is no longer appropriate in those circumstances.

77 It is less understandable, however, that, being in receipt of State aid, that body should offer services to other operators or local authorities without being subject to the legislation on public contracts, even though it is acting in circumstances comparable to those of a traditional economic operator. Its public origin and nature are not sufficient to mark it out from other service providers if it is offering the same type of service for a similar commercial purpose.

78 Diversification of activities, in an economic operator of this kind, shows that it has a special position as compared with the in-house departments of its controlling local authority, and that this position amounts to more than just a special feature of the organisational structure.

79 Consequently, the considerations of safeguarding competition that justify the Community rules on the award of public contracts apply to that economic operator just as much as they apply to other service providers.

80 Similarly, a service provider which intends entering into a contract with a local authority other than its own is no different from any other operator, from the point of view of both its competitors and the public authority awarding the contract. Since that body is not, by definition, a part of the contracting authority, as far as that authority is concerned, the services it is offering are those of a third party.

81 Clearly, whilst control of the service provider by the public authority awarding the contract is a necessary condition for the former to be considered to be providing `in house' services, it is far from being a sufficient condition. The service provider must carry out the essential part of its activity for the controlling local authority. Consequently, if it engages in commercial activities, the Directive is once again applicable, unless those activities represent a marginal part of its overall activity.

82 In this case, according to ARGE, both the Seibersdorf centre and the Arsenal institute are engaged in a large number of commercial activities on the market. (30)

83 In order to decide whether the Directive is applicable, the national court will have to verify this, even if, in its view, it seems to be settled that the bodies in question carry on their activities exclusively, or at least predominantly, for public authorities, as the wording of the fourth question suggests. It will have, above all, to ascertain whether the bodies in question carry out the essential part of their activities with the contracting authority, to whose control I have assumed they are subject in this case. (31)

84 If the Directive were to be declared applicable to the main proceedings, it would still be necessary to establish whether, in accordance with Article 6 of the Directive, the contract at issue is among the contracts that can be exempt from it.

3. The application of Article 6 of the Directive

85 It should be recalled that Article 6 excludes from the scope of the Directive contracts awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision which is compatible with the Treaty.

86 That provision echoes the 18th recital of the Directive, according to which `... contracts with a designated single source of supply may, under certain conditions, be fully or partly exempted from this Directive.'

87 By making a reservation in regard to that type of contract, the Directive is taking account of services which may be supplied to the public authorities in certain Member States only by specific public bodies, to the exclusion of all other service providers. The other entities are excluded regardless of nationality. (32)

88 Application of the Directive therefore depends, first and foremost, on the nature of the service provider concerned. In this case, it is already clear that the subsidised bodies meet the three criteria laid down by the Directive in its definition of `bodies governed by public law', an expression used to describe contracting authorities other than the State, regional or local authorities and associations formed by one or more of such authorities. (33)

89 It is common ground that these bodies were established to meet needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, that they have legal personality and are managed, controlled or financed for the most part by another contracting authority. (34)

90 Since they are thus themselves contracting authorities, it remains to be shown that they both enjoy an exclusive right, within the meaning of Article 6 of the Directive, pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision.

91 None of the evidence cited by the national court or the interveners indicates that, at the time of the invitation to tender, either of the research bodies enjoyed an exclusive right to provide services of the kind involved in the award procedure. Neither Article 6 nor the concept of exclusivity on which it is based are even mentioned in the order for reference, confirming the impression that neither of the two tenderers challenged by ARGE enjoyed an exclusive right.

92 Moreover, had they enjoyed such a right, it is not clear why an award procedure should have been organised in accordance with the Directive, given that Article 6 specifically provides that a contract of that kind can be exempt from the Directive.

93 I therefore conclude that the Directive is applicable where a contracting authority intends to enter into a contract with an entity that is formally distinct from it and belongs for the most part to local authorities other than those that make up the contracting authority.

If, although formally distinct from the contracting authority, the entity belongs for the most part to that authority, the Directive is applicable if that entity carries out the essential part of its activity with operators or local authorities other than those of which the contracting authority is made up.

In both cases, the Directive is not applicable if the contract falls within the scope of Article 6 of the Directive.

VII - The existence of discrimination during the procedure for the award of public service contracts (first question)

94 By its first question, the Bundesvergabeamt is asking whether Article 3(2) of the Directive must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes a decision whereby a contracting authority admits to a procedure for the award of public service contracts bodies which receive subsidies from contracting authorities that enable them to tender at prices which are substantially below those of the other tenderers.

95 The principle of equal treatment of tenderers laid down in Article 3(2) is not intended merely to prohibit discrimination that might be applied to economic operators who are nationals of other Member States. Like other provisions in the same Directive or in directives concerning other kinds of public contracts, (35) it contains no condition on nationality.

96 The infringement of the Directive is not therefore necessarily linked to a failure to accord equal treatment to tenderers from other Member States.

97 Moreover, that same philosophy underpins the relevant national legislation. Article 16(1) of the Bundesvergabegesetz accordingly provides that: `Contracts for services under a procedure provided for in this law are to be awarded, in accordance with the principles of free and fair competition and of equal treatment of all candidates and tenderers, to undertakings which - at the latest at the time of opening of tenders - are authorised, efficient and reliable, at reasonable prices.'

98 The fact that, in this case, the operators benefiting from subsidies are all Austrian entities is not therefore relevant for the purposes of answering the first question.

99 It must first be established whether the very principle of according subsidies to economic operators bars them from taking part in procedures for the award of public contracts, and, if it does not, we should then go on to consider whether that is so even if the subsidies in question are illegal.

100 According to the Bundesvergabeamt, the subsidies paid to the tenderers constitute aid within the meaning of Article 92 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 87 EC) or `special cost advantages.' (36) It explains that: `The competitive advantage in the form of lower costs...' that they enjoy `... derives from payments in the nature of aid, which may take the form either of the direct payment of money or of the provision of staff or premises or technical equipment or both.' The national court adds that the payment is made by the relevant regional or local authority, the State or a Province. (37)

101 It should be borne in mind that `the concept of aid... encompasses not only positive benefits, such as subsidies, but also interventions which, in various forms, mitigate the charges which are normally included in the budget of an undertaking and which, without therefore being subsidies in the strict sense of the word, are of the same character and have the same effect.' (38) In so far as staff or goods are supplied by the Austrian public authorities for no consideration or on preferential terms, (39) there is reason to consider that the advantages thus conferred constitute State aid within the meaning of Article 92 of the Treaty.

102 However, as we know, the fundamental prohibition of State aid is neither absolute nor unconditional since not only is some State aid ipso jure compatible with the common market in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 92, but the third paragraph of Article 92 confers on the Commission a wide discretion to allow aid by way of derogation from the prohibition laid down in the first paragraph. (40)

103 If Community law accepts that some State aid is lawful, then, in my view, operators in receipt of that aid must have the right to carry on their activity in the same way as other operators. What point would there be in according undertakings aid lawfully if, at the same time, they were barred from engaging in normal economic activity or even merely from certain contracts on the pretext that the latter were regulated. Moreover, that interpretation would hardly be compatible with the concept of compensation which justifies some kinds of aid, because aid in the form of subsidy or logistical assistance would soon be eliminated as a result of the restrictions on an undertaking's activity.

104 The fact that State aid may be legal therefore implies that economic entities in receipt of lawful aid cannot be precluded from participating fully in the market. As the market is not restricted to unregulated contractual relations but also includes public contracts, there is no reason why such operators should be excluded from public contract award procedures.

105 According to the Commission, whose point of view must be endorsed here, aid that has been notified and declared compatible with the common market cannot affect the decision of the contracting authority to admit a tenderer or the assessment of its tender.

106 I should add that, as the Austrian and French Governments point out, (41) the exclusion from the scope of the Directive of certain contracts concluded between two contracting authorities in accordance with Article 6 thereof, where a public service contract is awarded on the basis of an exclusive right, confirms the view that the Directive may apply to bodies which benefit from State aid where they do not enjoy such a right. As we have seen, the definition of contracting authority in the Directive covers bodies governed by public law, defined as bodies able to be financed, for the most part, by regional or local authorities. (42) For the Directive to be applicable, it is therefore sufficient that a service provider should fulfil the definition of contracting authority, which usually indicates the existence of public financing, without being linked on the basis of an exclusive right to the contracting authority to which it is providing the services. The Directive does not therefore rule out participation by a subsidised body in a public contract award procedure.

107 In those circumstances, the Directive does not preclude entities such as the bodies concerned in the main proceedings from participating in the public service contract award procedure at issue.

108 However, the answer to the question of the approach a contracting authority should take to a tenderer in receipt of illegal State aids is not quite so clear. (43)

109 It is perfectly natural that operators which have been rejected, or whose chances of winning a contract have diminished because of competition from entities which enjoy competitive advantages of this nature, should challenge the right of the contracting authority to allow those entities to tender without having to carry out a minimum of checks on the legality of the aid.

110 If an aid is illegal the effect should be to bar the subsidised operator from taking part in any public tender procedure. Even if not specifically earmarked for certain elements - such as the price offered in the tender procedure - which significantly influence the final decision of the contracting authority, aid illegally accorded to an economic operator is bound to mitigate the charges that reduce its level of economic competitiveness.

111 None the less, however well-founded it may be, that view does not resolve the - essentially legal and procedural - problem facing the national court in the main proceedings. That court has in fact to establish whether the principle of equal treatment of tenderers, as set out in Article 3(2) of the Directive, encompasses the right of the contracting authority to bar tenderers benefiting from illegal subsidies from taking part, or indeed to investigate whether the subsidies they receive may be declared to be illegal.

112 Title VI of the Directive sets out the attributes required of the tenderers, the content of their tenders, and the relevant documentary evidence, those factors determining the admission of the operators to the procedure and the final award of the contract.

113 Also set out there are the criteria that give the contracting authority the right to bar a particular service provider from taking part in an award procedure. A number of provisions concern the legal obligations that are binding on the service provider. They permit the contracting authority to preclude a tenderer in an illegal position from the point of view of tax or social requirements, for example. (44)

However, the Directive is silent as to the action the contracting authority could take were it to establish the existence of aid that had not been notified, was suspected of being illegal or was manifestly illegal.

114 The Commission has described the background to the Directive from that angle. It pointed out that its initial proposal for a directive (45) included a provision identical to the last paragraph of Article 34(5) of Council Directive 93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors. (46) According to that provision: `Authorities may reject tenders which are abnormally low owing to the receipt of State aid only if they have consulted the tenderer and if the tenderer has not been able to show that the aid in question has been notified to the Commission pursuant to Article 93(3) of the Treaty and has received the Commission's approval. Authorities which reject a tender under these circumstances shall inform the Commission thereof.'

115 According to the Commission, the Council deleted that provision from its proposal for a directive in the course of the legislative procedure. (47) In response, the Commission made a declaration in its communication to the European Parliament to the effect that by amending the proposal for a directive in that way, the Council was expressing its concern to avoid any discrimination between private and public tenderers. In that same declaration, it observed that the Treaty gave it the power to prevent the improper use of State aid that could distort competition, and it could therefore accept the amendments.

116 The history of the Directive is instructive in two ways.

117 It is first apparent that, at the time the Directive was adopted, the legislature was aware of the problem linked to the existence of economic operators enjoying an advantage in procedures for the award of public contracts because they were in receipt of State aid. Moreover, the Commission's decision to restrict the regulation of situations of this kind solely to aid that had not been notified or had not been approved confirms acceptance of the principle that entities in receipt of legally accorded State aids could participate in procedures for the award of service contracts. My earlier analysis of this point is therefore confirmed here, on the basis of the intention of the Community legislature. (48)

118 A further indication is provided by the fact that the Community legislature also adopted an unambiguous stance as regards the extent of the power to act accorded to the contracting authority in relation to public service contracts. In its final version, the first paragraph of Article 37 of the Directive deals in particular with the right of the contracting authority to reject tenders which are obviously low in relation to the service to be provided. It lays down that the contracting authority must request details of the constituent elements of the tender and verify them, taking account of the explanations received, before it may reject the tender.

However, since it lacks a specific provision akin to Article 34 of Directive 93/38/EEC, the Directive does not give the contracting authority the right to reject a tender submitted by a tenderer in receipt of illegal aid or benefiting from aid which has not been notified to the Commission. That is to be regretted, particularly since it is not clear why the legal system of Directive 93/38/EEC should be different from that of Directive 92/50/EEC.

119 The fact remains that the Directive is silent on this point for a reason which must be taken into account in interpreting the text.

120 The Council's amendment to the Commission's proposal for a directive, and indeed the Commission's declaration of approval, reveal the Community legislature's approach to the mechanism for monitoring illegal State aids, for which the Commission has prime responsibility.

121 According to the French Government and the Commission, the fact that the Directive is silent about the right of the contracting authority to reject the tender of an illegally subsidised tenderer does not necessarily mean that the contracting authority cannot draw the appropriate conclusions from the existence of that kind of aid.

122 The French Government considers that the Directive neither compels nor expressly permits the contracting authority to exclude a tender from a subsidised body. But it emphasises the risk it would run if it awarded a contract to a tenderer in receipt of illegal aid. The French Government asserts that if a contracting authority were to establish that an abnormally low tender was financed through illegal aid, it would be entitled to reject it. The risk of having to repay aid improperly granted would in fact adversely affect both the tenderer and the full performance of the contract.

123 The Commission considers that illegal aid may be taken into account at the stage at which undertakings are selected, that is to say at the point when the contracting authority assesses the financial and economic standing of the service provider. Like the French Government, the Commission bases its argument on the fact that, in accordance with the Court's case-law, State aid which is incompatible with the common market, or has simply not been notified, may be recovered. It points out that a contracting authority cannot be criticised for protecting itself against the risk of entering into a contract with an economic operator in receipt of aid of doubtful legality, by excluding the latter on the basis of checks on its financial and economic standing. The Commission therefore proposes that the Court should rule that Community law does not preclude a contracting authority from taking into consideration at the selection stage, in accordance with its national law, when determining a tenderer's financial standing, the fact that it has been in receipt of aid that is illegal and may therefore be subject to recovery.

124 Whatever the respective merits of these arguments, in my view, they should be considered only to the extent that they help resolve the dispute in the main proceedings. However, as I have said, as it is formulated and as it must be interpreted in the light of the request for a preliminary ruling, the first question concerns the legality of a decision whereby a contracting authority has admitted subsidised entities to a procedure for the award of contracts.

125 The issue here, therefore, is not to provide the national court with guidance as to whether the contracting authority has the power to exclude a tenderer or reject its tender for reasons linked to the legality of the aid. The national court has, instead, to be informed whether the contracting authority has an obligation to proceed in that way where the State aid is illegal.

As Community law now stands, I have to take the view that a contracting authority is entitled to draw no conclusions, as regards the admission of a subsidised body, from the existence of aid which has not been notified or is illegal. I should add that the position would have been no different had the original text of Article 37 not been amended. Article 37 actually accorded the contracting authority a mere power to reject a tender which was abnormally low because the tenderer was in receipt of aid that had been improperly paid or had not been notified.

126 The Austrian Government, finally, points to the binding provisions of the Treaty relating to competition and the application of Article 37 of the Directive, where a tender appears to be abnormally low in relation to the service provided. In accordance with that provision, it advocates a detailed consideration of the various cost elements that make up the tender at issue. If the cost breakdown shows that the tender is incompatible with the principles of competition, because of unauthorised subsidies, it suggests that it should be mandatorily rejected.

127 The argument by the Austrian Government is based on both the procedure currently provided for under the Directive if a tender is abnormally low and on Community competition law. Here again, it is not necessary to analyse the validity of the argument, and it is sufficient to point out that the Republic of Austria is assuming that, subsequent to the decision at issue to allow an entity to participate, the contracting authority establishes that the tender is abnormally low and makes clear its intention of rejecting it. In substance, it therefore goes beyond the subject-matter of the first question, which is confined to the admission procedure.

128 On the basis of the above considerations, I conclude that the principle of equal treatment of tenderers, provided for in Article 3(2) of the Directive, does not preclude a decision whereby a contracting authority admits to a procedure for the award of public contracts entities in receipt of aid from contracting authorities which enables them to submit tenders at prices substantially below those submitted by the other tenderers.

Conclusion

129 In view of the foregoing, I propose that the Court answer the questions submitted by the Bundesvergabeamt as follows:

(1) Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 49 EC) et seq. must be interpreted as meaning that they do not preclude a measure such as the decision at issue in the main proceedings, whereby a contracting authority admits to a procedure for the award of public contracts entities in receipt of public subsidies which enable them to submit tenders at prices substantially below the prices submitted by the other tenderers, even if those entities all have the nationality of the Member State in which the contracting authority is established and are themselves established in the territory of that Member State, provided the decision is not subject to any condition relating to the nationality of the operators, their place of establishment or the origin of the subsidies they may receive.

(2) Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts is applicable where a contracting authority intends to enter into a contract with an entity that is formally distinct from it and belongs for the most part to local authorities other than those which make up the contracting authority.

If, although formally distinct from the contracting authority, the entity belongs for the most part to that authority, Directive 92/50/EEC is applicable if that entity carries out the essential part of its activity with operators or local authorities other than those of which the contracting authority is made up.

In both cases, Directive 92/50/EEC is not applicable where the contract falls within the scope of Article 6 thereof.

(3) The principle of equal treatment of tenderers provided for in Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50/EEC does not preclude a decision whereby a contracting authority admits to a procedure for the award of public contracts entities in receipt of aid from contracting authorities which enable them to submit tenders at prices substantially below those submitted by the other tenderers.

(9) - Although the second question refers to bodies which have the nationality of the Member State or are established in the Member State in which the contracting authority is itself established, it is clear from the grounds for the request for a preliminary ruling that, in this case, these are cumulative and not alternative factors (p. 10 of the English translation of the order for reference).

(10) - The attribution of `nationality' to legal persons, which makes it possible for them to be discriminated against by reason of nationality, arises out of the Treaty. In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 58 of the EC Treaty (now the first paragraph of Article 48 EC), which is applicable to services pursuant to Article 66 of the EC Treaty (now Article 55 EC): `Companies or firms formed in accordance with the law of a Member State and having their registered office, central administration or principal place of business within the Community shall, for the purposes of this Chapter, be treated in the same way as natural persons who are nationals of Member States.' The location of their registered office, central administration or principal place of business serves as the factor connecting them with the legal system of a particular State in the same way as does nationality in the case of a natural person (see, in particular, Case C-212/97 Centros [1999] ECR I-1459, paragraph 20).

(15) - I would point out that, according to the Bundesvergabeamt: `It is perfectly conceivable that in other Member States too there are bodies which are provided with comparable subsidies by their Member State and could take part in the award procedure...' (see p. 13 of the English translation of the order for reference). The possibility that foreign operators similarly subsidised by the relevant authorities of their own Member State could take part is not, however, sufficient, in the view of the national court, to rule out the possibility of discrimination by reason of nationality, the place of establishment of the tenderers or the origin of the subsidies they enjoy. Accordingly, it goes on to explain, in the same sentence, that `... commercial service providers from other Member States could or should not expect to encounter Austrian tenderers in the award procedure who have a significant cost advantage over them as a result of subsidies from Austrian regional or local authorities...'. In so doing, it appears that the Bundesvergabeamt is ruling out one argument that might establish the absence of any restriction on the free movement of services - the opportunity for subsidised foreign undertakings to respond to the invitation to tender in exactly the same way as the subsidised national undertakings - by raising other considerations - violation of the principle of equal treatment of operators, regardless of national origin, as a result of the participation of subsidised undertakings. I shall examine that argument as part of my analysis of the first question.

1993, p. 150 et seq, paragraph 9, No 10.

(33) - According to Article 1(b) of the Directive, `contracting authorities shall mean the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law.

Bodies governed by public law means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.'

In Case C-44/96 Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others [1998] ECR I-73, paragraph 21, the Court interpreted those conditions, as also provided for in the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54) as being cumulative. That same solution can be applied to Article 1(b) of the Directive, which is identical to the latter text.

(34) - See p. 10 of the English translation of the order for reference.

(35) - For instance, Article 3(1) of the Directive provides that, in awarding public service contracts or in organising design contests, contracting authorities are to apply procedures adapted to the provisions of the Directive. The Court clearly stated, in relation to a comparable piece of legislation - Article 4(1) of Council Directive 90/531/EEC of 17 September 1990 on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy and transport and telecommunications sectors (OJ 1990 L 297, p. 1), which provides that Directive 90/351/EEC is to apply when the contracting bodies are awarding their supply contracts, is identically worded - that there was no condition relating to the nationality or place of establishment of the tenderers (Case C-87/94 Commission v Belgium [1996] ECR I-2043, paragraph 32). Furthermore, it is clear from the 20th recital of the Directive that the elimination of practices that restrict competition is not confined to practices which impede the participation in award procedures of nationals of other Member States. Similarly, the Court held in Case C-243/89 Commission v Denmark [1993] ECR I-3353, paragraph 33, in relation to Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682) that although the directive makes no express mention of the principle of equal treatment of tenderers, the duty to observe that principle lies at the very heart of the directive whose purpose is, according to one of its recitals, to ensure the development of effective competition in the field of public contracts and the criteria for selection and the award of contracts, by means of which such competition is to be ensured. The Court was called upon to rule on a complaint based on an infringement of Directive 71/305/EEC which was linked to the nationality of the tenderer to whom the contract had been awarded. The objective of safeguarding competition pursued by the public contract directives must be achieved by applying the principle of equal treatment, which is not automatically confined to discrimination by reason of nationality. In my view, the principle of free competition is independent of the principle of the freedom to provide services, on which the Directive is founded, even though the two principles are closely related, with the former underpinning the effectiveness of the latter.

(43) - Although this issue was frequently raised, both in the written observations and at the hearing, the question of the regime applicable to illegal State aids is purely hypothetical in this case, as no one is claiming that the aid enjoyed by the research bodies can be termed illegal.

(44) - According to Article 29(f), for example, a service provider which has not fulfilled its obligations relating to the payment of taxes in accordance with the legal provisions of the country of the contracting authority may be excluded from participating in a contract.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 7 December 2000.
Ordine degli Architetti delle province di Milano e Lodi, Piero De Amicis, Consiglio Nazionale degli Architetti and Leopoldo Freyrie v Comune di Milano, and Pirelli SpA, Milano Centrale Servizi SpA and Fondazione Teatro alla Scala.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale per la Lombardia - Italy.
Public works contracts - Directive 93/37/EEC - National legislation under which the holder of a building permit or approved development plan may execute infrastructure works directly, by way of set-off against a contribution - National legislation permitting the public authorities to negotiate directly with an individual the terms of administrative measures concerning him.
Case C-399/98.

1. In the present case the Court is asked to rule on the substantive scope of Community law governing public works contracts in the context of national planning legislation.

2. Where public and private interests overlap in relation to a development project, questions necessarily arise where procedures under national legislation leave private operators the responsibility of providing basic facilities, and even public facilities for purely leisure purposes, associated with their project.

3. Such is the nature of the issue raised in the proceedings pending before the Italian court, which has submitted questions necessitating examination of the conditions governing the application of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for granting public works contracts.

I - Legal background

A - Community legislation

4. Article 1(a), (b) and (c) provide:

(a) "public works contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority;

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

(c) a "work" means the outcome of building or civil engineering, works taken as a whole that is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic and technical function.

5. The activities listed in Annex II referred to in Article 1(a) are the activities of building and civil engineering corresponding to Class 50 of the general industrial classification of economic activities within the European Communities nomenclature (NACE).

6. Under Article 2 of the Directive:

1. Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that the contracting authorities comply or ensure compliance with this Directive where they subsidise directly by more than 50% a works contract awarded by an entity other than themselves.

2. Paragraph 1 shall concern only contracts covered by Class 50, Group 502, of the general industrial classification of economic activities within the European Communities (NACE) nomenclature and contracts relating to building work for hospitals, facilities intended for sports, recreation and leisure, school and university buildings and buildings used for administrative purposes.

7. Articles 4 and 5 indicate the categories of contracts to which the Directive does not apply, such as contracts governed by Directive 90/531/EEC, works contracts declared secret or accompanied by special security measures or contracts governed by different procedural rules and awarded in pursuance of specific international agreements.

8. Article 6 sets the threshold for the application of the Directive at ECU 5 000 000 net of VAT.

9. Article 7(2) and (3) describe the circumstances in which the contracting authorities may use negotiated procedures which means, according to the definition given in Article 1(g), those national procedures whereby contracting authorities consult contractors of their choice and negotiate the terms of the contract with one or more of them.

10. According to Article 7(4), in all cases other than those mentioned in Article 7(2) and (3), the contracting authorities are to award their public works contracts by the open procedure or by the restricted procedure

B - Italian Legislation

Legislation on town planning and community facilities

11. According to applicable national legislation, building activity is subject to public authority control. Pursuant to Article 1 of Law No 10/77 of 28 January 1977, any activity involving the urban development of municipal land and building works on such land entails liability to contribute to the related costs and the execution of such works is conditional upon a permit being granted by the mayor.

12. Pursuant to Article 3 of the same Law, the granting of the permit entails payment of a contribution commensurate with the costs of development and the cost of construction.

13. The infrastructure contribution is paid to the municipality when the permit is granted. However, pursuant to Article 11(1) of Law No. 10/77, by way of total or partial set-off against the amount payable, the permit holder may undertake to carry out direct execution of the infrastructure works, observing the procedures and safeguards laid down by the municipality.

14. As regards specifically the coordinated execution of a complex of works in accordance with a development plan the situation in the main proceedings Article 28(5) of Law No 1150/42 on urban development makes the requisite municipal permission subject to conclusion of an agreement, to be registered by or on behalf of the owner, which provides as follows:

(1) ... the land required for secondary infrastructure works shall be transferred free of charge, subject to the provisions of subparagraph (2) below;

(2) the owner shall undertake to bear the costs of the primary infrastructure works; the owner shall also undertake to meet part of the cost of the secondary infrastructure works involved in the development project or of the works necessary to link the area to the various public utilities; the amount payable shall be commensurate with the nature and extent of the project works;

(3) the works referred to in subparagraph (3) above must be completed within ten years.

Article 28 (7) of Planning Law No 1150/42 also sets a time-limit of ten years for the execution of infrastructure works for which the owner is to be responsible.

15. By virtue of Article 4 of Law No 847/64 of 29 September 1964, health and cultural facilities constitute secondary infrastructure works.

16. Article 8 of Lombard Regional Law No 60 of 5 December 1977 provides for development works to be carried out by private persons by way of set-off against infrastructure contributions payable for an ordinary building permit. Applicants for a permission may request that they be authorised to carry out directly one or more primary or secondary development works, the permit being issued by the mayor where such direct execution is deemed conducive to the public interest.

17. The execution of infrastructure works provided for in a development plan, on the other hand, is governed by Article 12 of the abovementioned Regional Law, as amended by Article 3 of Regional Law No 31 of 30 July 1986. According to that article the agreement which must be concluded before a building permit can be issued for the operations provided for in the project plans must provide for carrying out by or on behalf of the owners of all the primary infrastructure works and a portion of the secondary infrastructure works or those necessary to link the area to the public services. Where execution of the works involves charges lower than those separately laid down for primary and secondary infrastructures, the difference must be paid. In any event it is open to the municipality to require, in lieu of the direct execution of the works, payment of a sum commensurate with the actual cost of the infrastructure works relating to the project and with the area and characteristics of the buildings, and in any event in an amount not lower than the charges laid down in the municipal resolution referred to in Article 3.

18. The regional legislation also gives a list of secondary infrastructure works, which includes cultural facilities.

Legislation on administrative procedure

19. The national court notes that the procedures in question in the case before it are not remote from certain forms of what is known in Italy as consensual administration. In other words, the public administration abandons or moderates its authoritative and unilateral stance and negotiates directly with the private operator to agree on the terms of administrative measures affecting the latter.

20. General Law No 241 of 7 August 1990 on procedure lays down new rules governing administrative procedure and the right of access to administrative documents.

21. Article 11 of that Law provides that the administration may conclude, without prejudice to the rights of third parties and in pursuit of the public interest, agreements with interested parties in order to determine the discretionary terms of the final measure or, in cases for which the law so provides, to replace the latter.

II - Facts and procedure before the national court

22. By Resolution No 82/96 of 12 September 1996, the municipal council of Milan approved a programme of works, comprising three separate parts, known as the Scala 2001 Project.

23. Essentially, those parts related to the execution of the following works:

- restoration of and alterations to the historical building of Teatro alla Scala;

- alterations to municipal buildings in a building complex, and

- construction, in the so-called Bicocca area, of a new theatre, with about 2,300 seats, having an area of around 25,000 m2 (plus 2,000 m2 parking) intended to accommodate, in the initial stage, the activities of the historic headquarters of the Piazza Scala for the period needed to carry out the restoration works and alterations. Subsequently, that facility would accommodate all activities relating to the performance of dramatic works and other cultural events.

24. In the Bicocca area a planning project was devised, catering for a large number of buildings with a view to developing the former industrial zone. Società Pirelli (Pirelli) acted, together with other private operators, as the owner-developer. That private initiative, which was a long-term commitment and had passed all the stages of the administrative procedure, was in the process of being carried out when the events leading to the case in the main proceedings occurred.

25. Among the town-planning measures envisaged in relation to the site, the municipality of Milan had already made provision for the construction of a general-purpose multi-communal structure. The theatre was to be part of that structure.

26. By Resolution No 82/96, the municipal council of Milan then gave a number of commitments concerning the execution of works, time-limits and financing for the Scala 2001 project approving a specific agreement between the municipality of Milan, on the one hand, and, on the other, Pirelli, Ente Autonomo Teatro alla Scala and Milano Centrale Servizi SpA, as agent for the promoters of Progetto Bicocca (Bicocca Project). That agreement, signed on 18 October 1996, incorporated the following terms concerning the Bicocca section of Scala 2001:

- MCS, as agent for the promoters of the development project, was to construct the new theatre (and the parking area) as secondary infrastructure works in the Bicocca area and on the land provided for that purpose, given free of charge by the promoters to the municipality of Milan. Construction of the theatre was in partial payment of the infrastructure contribution payable under national and regional legislation. The commitment undertaken was limited to the construction of the outer shell of the building. According to MCS, the municipality of Milan was responsible for completing the interior of the building and was obliged to organise a public tendering procedure for that purpose, and

- MCS was to hand over the building before the end of 1998.

27. The Ordine degli Architetti delle Province di Milano e Lodi (Order of Architects of the Provinces of Milan and Lodi) and the architect Piero de Amicis, in his own right, brought an action for the annulment of Resolution No 82/96 before the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per la Lombardia (Italy).

28. Following the adoption of new guidelines by the incoming municipal administration at the beginning of 1998, the municipal council of Milan adopted Resolution No 6/98 of 16 and 17 February 1998 whereby it:

- approved the preliminary plan for the construction of the theatre;

- confirmed that the work would be constructed in part directly by the developers in implementation of the contractual obligations relating to the development plan; it was also noted that the cost of the work in question amounted to ITL 25 billion, and

- amended the time-limits written into the agreement for the completion of certain measures. The completion date for the new theatre thus became 31 December 2000.

29. The Consiglio Nazionale degli Architetti (National Council of Architects) and the architect Leopoldo Freyrie, in his own right, brought proceedings for the annulment of Resolution No 6/98 before the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per la Lombardia.

30. In those two actions for annulment, the plaintiffs contend that the contested resolutions are invalid under both Italian town-planning and public contract law and under Community law. As regards the latter aspect, they maintain that the theatre works are in the nature of public works and therefore the municipal council should have complied with Community tendering procedures rather than granting a contract directly, thereby harming the interests represented by the OAML and those of the plaintiff architects.

III - Questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

31. In its order for reference, the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per la Lombardia states that the municipality of Milan correctly applied Italian (national and regional) legislation in respect of town planning. On the other hand, with regard to Community law, the national court raises certain doubts as to whether direct execution of infrastructure works by way of set-off against the contribution payable constitutes a public works contract as defined by Community law.

32. Accordingly, it decided to refer to the Court the following questions for a preliminary ruling:

1. Is national and regional legislation which allows a builder (who holds a building permit or approved development plan) to carry out infrastructure works directly, by way of total or partial set-off against the contribution payable (Article 11 of Law No 10/77, Articles 28 and 31 of Law No 1150 of 17 August 1942, Articles 8 and 12 of Law No 60 of the Lombardy Region of 5 December 1977), contrary to Directive 93/37/EEC, having regard to the strict tendering principles imposed on Member States by Community law in respect of all public works of a value of [EUR] 5 million or more?

2. Notwithstanding the principles concerning tendering referred to above, may agreements between the administrative authorities and a private person (generally permitted by Article 11 of Law No 241 of 7 August 1990) be regarded as compatible with Community law in areas where the procedure is that the administrative authorities choose a party with whom a contract for services is to be concluded, in cases where such services exceed the threshold laid down by the relevant directives?

IV - Admissibility of the first question

33. The municipality of Milan and the FTS doubt whether there is any connection between the first question and the subject-matter of the main proceedings.

34. They maintain that the national court limited the admissibility of the actions before it to aspects of the case concerned with the allocation of work relating to the design of the theatre, thereby excluding those aspects concerned with the execution of the works. That decision is based on the status of the plaintiffs, who are not contractors but architects, and their professional bodies.

Accordingly, the first question for a preliminary ruling, which is limited to interpreting the Directive, cannot help to resolve a dispute relating to the provision of services.

35. The municipality of Milan and the FTS further maintain that the work relating to the design of the theatre was simply provided free of charge to the municipal administration by Pirelli and MCS. Its cost cannot therefore be included in the cost of the works to be offset against the infrastructure contribution.

By arguing thus, the parties to the main proceedings appear to allege that since that part of the project at issue involved no payment, it falls outside the scope of the Directive, which is based on the assumption that the project in question should involve a pecuniary interest.

36. According to settled case-law of this Court, in the context of cooperation between the Court and the national courts enshrined in Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC), it is for the national courts alone, before which the proceedings are pending and which must assume responsibility for the judgment to be given, to determine, having regard to the particular features of each case, both the need for a preliminary ruling to enable them to give a judgment and the relevance of the questions which they refer to the Court. Accordingly, since the questions referred relate to the interpretation of Community law, the Court is, in principle, required to give a ruling.

37. A request from a national court for a preliminary ruling may be rejected only if it is quite obvious that the interpretation of Community law sought by that court bears no relation to the actual nature of the case or the subject-matter of the main action.

38. In the present case, it cannot be accepted that a dispute relating to the method of appointing an economic operator responsible for the construction of a theatre bears no relation to Community law on public works contracts since the project was undertaken at the request of a municipality and the building works in question are considered as community facilities under national legislation.

39. Furthermore, in the order for reference, the national court does not endorse the assertion that the admissibility of the actions is limited to aspects of the case concerned with the design of the theatre and not the works themselves. Such an assertion is actually demolished by the fact that the application is declared admissible by the court without mention of any such restriction. Furthermore, pursuant to Article 1(a) of the Directive, public works contracts include contracts which have as their object both the execution and the design of works.

40. Finally, as regards the fact that the design work was provided free of charge, the argument put forward is a matter of substance and does not affect admissibility. Accordingly, there is no reason for concluding on that basis that the question raised has no bearing on the main proceedings.

41. The first question must therefore be declared admissible.

V - The questions submitted for a preliminary ruling

42. By both its questions, the national court seeks a ruling on whether various provisions of Italian town planning law are compatible with Community law.

43. According to settled case-law, although the Court has no jurisdiction under Article 177 of the Treaty to apply a rule of Community law to a particular case and thus to judge a provision of national law by reference to such a rule it may, in the framework of the judicial cooperation provided for by that article and on the basis of the material presented to it, provide a national court with an interpretation of Community law which may be useful to it in assessing the effects of that provision.

44. Accordingly, an interpretation of the Directive should be provided so as to enable the national court to rule on the propriety of rules which allow an operator to participate in the construction of public facilities without any tendering procedure being conducted.

45. It will be noted that the second question seeks to ascertain whether agreements between the administration and private persons may be regarded as compatible with Community law where the public administration chooses a party with whom a contract for services is to be concluded and the costs of such services exceeds the threshold laid down by the relevant directives.

46. If, as in the present case, the question asked may be construed as requesting an interpretation of Community law, but does not identify the provisions of Community law which are in issue, it is incumbent on the Court to extract from all the information provided by the national court the elements of Community law requiring an interpretation, having regard to the subject-matter of the dispute.

47. By this question, the national court seeks a ruling under Community law concerning a principle of Italian law which it refers to as consensual administration, that is to say where the Public Administration abandons or moderates its authoritative and unilateral stance and negotiates directly with the private operator to agree on the terms of administrative measures affecting the latter.

48. The Italian court has focused upon the situation where the services to which those agreements may apply exceed the threshold laid down by the relevant directives. It therefore appears that, in the absence of any more detailed information on the rule of Community law in question, the question is concerned only with the interpretation of Community law on public contracts.

49. The national court also notes that the present case may of course come within the framework of broader national legislation, intended to favour negotiated procedures, citing in that context Article 11 of Law No 241/90.

50. However, it does not provide any details on the specific nature of that law, such as how it might apply to the circumstances of the main proceedings, as compared with the town-planning legislation referred to in the first question.

Under those circumstances, it appears that an interpretation of the Community provisions relating to public contracts can provide the national court with the detailed reply it requires to assess the standing of both laws. Accordingly, there is no reason to make a distinction between the two questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling.

51. Consequently, it must be concluded that the national court is asking, in essence, whether the Directive precludes national legislation which provides that, when implementation of a development plan requires construction works in order to provide community facilities, the holder of the building permit is to be responsible for carrying out those works, at his expense, in return for exemption from payment of the amount due to the municipality in respect of the building permit, unless the municipality decides to collect the contribution instead of opting for direct execution of the works, without requiring any tendering procedure for the award of public works contracts provided for by the same directive.

52. Before examining the Directive, I shall consider for a moment the infrastructure works with which the main proceedings are concerned.

A - The legal nature of the theatre under national and Community law

53. According to the order for reference, under Italian law the theatre constitutes secondary infrastructure works.

Under national law, cultural facilities, to which category of infrastructure works this building belongs, are classified as secondary infrastructure works, there being 'no limitation to the local district in any purposive or functional sense. According to the national court, the deliberate omission of any such limitation clearly indicates that the legislature specifically wished, in respect of such works, to disregard the strict referential planning context.

54. The fact that a national cultural institution is considered an essential facility within a development project may appear somewhat surprising.

The lack of any legal distinction between a national theatre and infrastructure works linking the area to public services - classified under Italian law as primary infrastructure works - or facilities classified as secondary infrastructure works, such as kindergartens or green areas, means that the theatre is treated as an essential feature of the development under construction.

55. Accordingly, a theatre whose activities extend far beyond the locality in which it is situated is subject, by virtue of that legal status, to town-planning provisions which create specific obligations linked to the needs and amenities of that locality. For example, under Italian law, private developers have an obligation to meet any expenditure justified by the nature of the infrastructure which, in the present case, amounts to a particularly large sum.

56. It is not my task to evaluate the legal provision in question. That is a matter reserved exclusively to the legislature and its concept of what town planning involves.

57. However, the Court is responsible for ensuring that such an approach to town planning does not risk undermining the interests which the Community legislation on public contracts is designed to protect.

58. According to the national court, the construction of the theatre constitutes public works as defined in the Directive. Despite that, the legal status attributed by national law to this type of facility has specific implications which appear to derogate from the system established by the Directive. The developer is obliged to carry out the construction works or arrange to have them carried out, unless the municipality decides to collect the infrastructure contribution instead of opting for direct execution of the works. Moreover, the municipality can refuse direct execution and insist on payment only on grounds of public interest justified by the need to ensure proper and effective implementation of the development plan.

59. It might be feared that a burgeoning of similar laws in the Member States could render the Community rules on public contracts ineffectual. Member States might be tempted to include in their town-planning legislation whole categories of public works in order to remove them from the scope of Community law on public contracts which is considered both restrictive and costly in terms of time and money.

60. The importance of the debate concerning national legislation of this kind should not therefore be underestimated.

61. To determine whether public tendering procedures provided for by the Directive should be applied in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, it is necessary to define the substantive scope of the Directive in the light of its objectives.

B - The definition of public works contracts

62. The definition of public works contracts, for the purposes of the Directive, is given in Article 1(a).

63. The six conditions laid down by that provision are as follows: contracts must be for pecuniary interest, concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority which have as their object certain types of works.

64. It has been noted that the construction of the theatre is regarded as constituting public works or, at least, that the building is a work within the meaning of the Directive. The fact that the agreement is in writing is not contested. Finally, a municipality is a contracting authority as defined in Article 1(b) of the Directive since regional authorities are treated as such.

65. On the other hand, I take the view that legal relations such as those entered into by the City of Milan and the other defendants in the main proceedings, under the conditions laid down by national law, are not contractual in nature. Moreover, the condition relating to the status of contractor which the Directive requires the party dealing with the contracting authority to have is not necessarily met by legislation such as that in question. Finally, in my opinion, relationships of the type existing between the municipality and the developer are not for pecuniary interest as required by the Directive.

66. Those three conditions will be dealt with in turn.

The condition relating to the contractual nature of the legal relationship

67. A contract between the parties was indeed signed, but its content is limited to the arrangements for implementation of the project, such as the allocation of work as between the MCS, for the construction of the outer shell of the building, and the City of Milan, for the internal work, or the date of completion of the building.

68. However, there is something missing from the agreement which, in my opinion, is an essential element of a contractual relationship: the power to choose the contractor. According to the national court, a party called on to carry out development works is simply identified by law, in this case by Article 12 of Regional Law No 60 of 1977. The effect of that provision is that the works must be carried out by the owner of the land.

69. That non-contractual method of determining who is to be the subject to the obligation to carry out the infrastructure works is confirmed by its legal standing under national law. The FTS cites a judgment of the Corte Suprema Di Cassazione which states that the obligation on the owner to meet the cost of primary infrastructure works and a portion of the secondary infrastructure works... constitutes ... an obligation in rem. It follows that those works should be carried out by owners as soon as the building permit is issued. Owners may well be persons other than those who concluded the agreement by virtue of the fact that they have acquired part of the land which is to be divided into various lots or groups of lots.

70. The fact that there is no possibility of choosing the operator who is to carry out the infrastructure works considerably reduces, in my opinion, any risk of discrimination on the part of the contracting authority if it intends to favour national or local operators.

71. Let us consider for a moment the main purpose of the Directive: its precise aim is to eliminate discriminatory practices in the field of public contracts. It is clear that the wording of Article 1(a) reflects very accurately, as far as the requirement of a contractual relationship is concerned, the purpose assigned to it by the Community legislature.

72. The Directive seeks to avoid the risk of any preference being given to national tenderers or applicants whenever a contract is awarded by the contracting authorities.

73. The expression of a national preference constitutes an obstacle to freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, principles upon which the Directive is founded, and to the development of effective competition. There is no denying that, if an advantage is given to national operators over their competitors in other Member States, the latter will be dissuaded from establishing themselves in that territory or even from going there regularly to carry on business.

74. If a contracting authority is free to appoint a contractor to carry out public works, in return for payment, there is a real risk, often observed in the practices employed by public authorities of Member States, that those authorities may choose their contractors on the basis of criteria other than purely economic criteria.

75. Favouritism towards national operators runs counter to considerations concerned with the quality of work and price levels which ought to apply to the choice of undertakings. Such a situation adversely affects the interests both of excluded competitors, who suffer loss through being excluded, and of taxpayers, since the public authorities use of tax revenue has not been dictated by strictly economic considerations.

76. That is why Community rules on public contracts, and in particular the Directive, provide for contracts to be awarded by means of competitive tendering procedures.

77. That is also why the Directive requires, as one of the conditions determining its applicability, the establishment of a contractual relationship. Indeed, the procedural formalities of Community law on public contracts are justified only if the contracting authorities enjoy a degree of latitude in appointing economic operators. Otherwise, those constraints would be deprived of their justification, namely the risk that freedom of freedom of movement and freedom of competition might be undermined. It should not be forgotten that the freedom to choose is also the freedom to discriminate.

78. There is no freedom of choice here. It could re-emerge if the developer who, as will be seen, is not necessarily a contractor, were dictated to by the contracting authority, particularly as regards deciding who is to carry out the works. It is clear that any constraint imposed by the public authority in that respect would constitute an evasion of the law - if not of national law, at least of Community law - and should be reclassified as a contract between the contracting authority and the contractor.

79. In any event, the municipal administration has no freedom to intervene in the present case regarding either the choice of contractor or relations with that contractor during the performance of the contract, as almost all the parties recognise.

80. Under the national legislation at issue, the municipality may opt for payment of the infrastructure contribution or replace that obligation by direct execution of the works.

81. It is necessary to make certain that the reintroduction of an element of choice in the appointment of the contractor would not entail the risk of the contracting authority resorting once more to discriminatory practices.

82. That question would arise, of course, only if the municipality should decide to exercise its right to collect the infrastructure contribution rather than having the works carried out by way of set-off.

83. It is obvious that in those circumstances the procedures laid down by the Directive ought to apply since the contracting authority has decided to approach other contractors. But in doing so, it is exercising a choice, at least in the negative sense, by refusing the developer the right to execute the works himself.

84. I do not believe those fears are justified. First, it is not the case either that the developer is always a contractor or, if he were, that he would automatically wish to be granted the right to carry out the works. In either case, that right might well be regarded as involving an excessive burden and, from a personal point of view, one that was unjustified particularly since, if the developer himself undertakes to execute works and the resulting costs are less than envisaged, he is obliged to pay the difference to the municipality. Accordingly, execution of the works may constitute an obligation without any prospect of financial concessions in return for direct execution. Second, if the developer who is thus excluded wishes to carry out the works, he may still, if the Directive is properly applied, respond to the invitation to tender.

85. Accordingly, the condition relating to the contractual nature of the legal relationship cannot be regarded as satisfied.

The condition relating to the involvement of a contractor

86. The fact that the developer is not always a contractor is the second reason for rejecting the idea that national legislation which requires, without exception, direct execution of development works by way of set-off contravenes the Directive.

87. Such a condition presupposes a contract between a contracting authority and a contractor.

88. However, the national legislation at issue does not require that the developer be a contractor. Consequently, if the developer is not able to carry out the works himself, he must appoint a contractor to do so. It is with that contractor that he will enter into a contractual relationship, thus becoming the promoter, and not with the contracting authority. If, as already noted, the municipality is not involved in the relationship between the developer and the contractor, its potential influence is considerably reduced.

89. Such an arrangement cannot be considered to constitute a public contract, first because no contractor has a relationship with the municipality and, second, because the contracting authority has no involvement in the construction work assigned by the developer to the contractor.

90. The grounds for applying the Directive are once again absent. The dividing line between public contracts and relations of a strictly private nature has been crossed. The developer, a private operator responsible for paying for the works by way of set-off against the infrastructure contribution, is again adjusting to a purely economic reality which prompts him to make a choice that takes account of his own interests. The controlling of expenditure by a contracting authority which could easily come to believe itself to be free from any budgetary constraints gives way to the vigilance exercised by a private operator naturally concerned to limit his expenditure. Accordingly, effective competition is almost automatically guaranteed since, out of concern to save money, the private operator, who is free to choose any contractor and whose debt is limited to the amount he will have to pay to the latter, will endeavour to choose the best service at the best price.

The condition relating to the pecuniary nature of the legal relationship

91. It remains for me to set out the reasons why I consider that the relationship between the developer and the municipality, for the purpose of carrying out the works at issue, is devoid of any pecuniary interest as defined in Article 1(a) of the Directive.

92. The national court, on the other hand, considers that where the holder of a building permit undertakes infrastructure works, he is not providing anything free of charge. Rather, he is discharging a debt of the same value that arises in favour of the municipality as a result of his plan to carry out works which will give rise to the need for that infrastructure.

93. We have seen that the aim of the Directive is to eliminate discriminatory practices on the part of contracting authorities. However, there is a question as to whether freedom of movement and competition are still jeopardised where there is no pecuniary interest in carrying out the work.

94. Economic operators are motivated by the prospect of obtaining some economic benefit from contracts. Discrimination in awarding contracts is unacceptable because awards of contracts entail payment to the contractors who are selected. It would be difficult, where no finance was provided for a contract by the contracting authority, to imagine any kind of favouritism which could benefit the operator chosen. If anything done free of charge or financed by the party carrying out the work offends against the principle of competition, that is because it is damaging to that party's interests and not because it gives him any advantage over his competitors.

Under those circumstances, where there is discrimination in awarding to a contractor a contract for the performance of which he is not paid, there is no justification for following the procedures laid down by the Directive. It is sufficient, if it is assumed that circumstances might arise in which relations are of a contractual rather than a legal nature, for the economic operator to refuse to award the contract in order to eliminate the competitive disadvantage.

95. In that respect, what are the features of the national legislation at issue?

96. According to the documents before the Court, it appears that there are two possibilities.

97. Either the developer carries out the works or arranges for them to be carried out in lieu of payment of the infrastructure contribution, or else he pays the contribution to the municipality at its request and the latter then proceeds with the work in compliance with the rules on public works contracts. As we have seen, the latter case constitutes an exception to the principle of direct execution by way of set-off.

98. The national court considers that developers do not provide anything free of charge. That is correct in so far as works carried out by way of set-off discharge their obligation to pay the infrastructure contribution. Their action is then economic in nature on account of the existence of a payment. Even if the latter is made in kind rather than in money, the debt is discharged.

99. However, when the economic relationship - or rather the fiscal relationship in view of the nature of the contribution in lieu of which the works are executed - is examined more closely, it is clear that the risk of discrimination usually associated with the public financing of private activities is not present in this case.

100. Indeed, the economic nature of the relationship between the developer and the municipality under the national legislation at issue is not the same as the pecuniary nature of the contract required by the Directive, which merely constitutes, in my opinion, a threat to the interests protected by that instrument.

101. In contrast to the position most frequently encountered when public contracts are awarded, it does not appear that the public authority provides any finance for direct execution of the works by way of set-off. For his part, the developer, who receives no payment, bears the costs. When the work is finally completed the assets of the municipality will have been increased by the value of the building, without its having incurred any expense, whilst the developers assets will have been reduced to the same extent, without his receiving any consideration other than the waiving of the infrastructure contribution.

102. Accordingly, only the relationship between the developer and the contractor is of a pecuniary nature, whilst that between the developer and the municipality is not. In fact, the contractual relationship which most closely resembles the one envisaged in the Directive is that between the developer and the contractor.

103. Consequently, the relationship between the municipality and the developer cannot be classified as a legal relationship for pecuniary interest within the meaning of the Directive. By not playing any part in financing the works, in the case of direct execution by way of set-off, the municipality cannot be regarded as favouring the operator to whom it awards a contract in a case where the Directive is not applied.

104. The argument that the Directive should be applied by virtue of Article 2 must be rejected for the same reasons.

105. It should be noted that that provision requires Member States to take the necessary measures to ensure that the contracting authorities comply or ensure compliance with the Directive where they subsidise directly by more than 50% a works contract awarded by an entity other than themselves.

106. That provision is intended to prevent practices aimed at evading the rules applicable to public contracts. Certain contracting authorities might be tempted to entrust to private bodies responsibility for carrying out works relating to public contracts. Since the latter are not themselves contracting authorities, it would be easy for them to find a way around the legal constraints to the detriment of interests protected by the Directive. On the other hand, that risk is diminished if public subsidies account for less than 50% of the contract since a private operator providing most of the finance for the project will be encouraged to be more discerning in the management of his own funds.

107. In the present case, Article 2 of the Directive cannot be interpreted as being applicable to works entrusted by the developer to a contractor if they are not financed by the municipality.

Conclusion

108. In view of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court reply as follows to the questions submitted by the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per la Lombardia:

Article 1(a) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts does not preclude national legislation which provides that, when the implementation of a development plan calls for construction works to provide community facilities, it is incumbent on the holder of the building permit to carry out those works, at his expense, in return for exemption from the requirement to pay the contribution due to the municipality in respect of the building permit, unless the municipality decides to collect the infrastructure contribution in lieu of direct execution of the works, without requiring observance of the procedures for the award of public works contracts provided for by that directive.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 11 May 2000.
The Queen v H.M. Treasury, ex parte The University of Cambridge.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: High Court of Justice (England &Wales), Queen's Bench Division (Divisional Court) - United Kingdom.
Public contracts - Procedure for the award of public contracts for services, supplies and works - Contracting authority - Body governed by public law.
Case C-380/98.

I - Introduction

1. In these proceedings the High Court of Justice of England and Wales seeks a ruling from the Court of Justice on questions concerning the definition of a contracting authority. The main question is, under what conditions is a body financed for the most part by the State, regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law with the result that it is to be regarded as a contracting authority for the purposes of the directives on public procurement?

2. The question has arisen in proceedings brought by the University of Cambridge (or the applicant) against the United Kingdom Treasury. The applicant challenges the Treasury's proposal to retain universities in the list for the United Kingdom of bodies governed by public law in Annex I to Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, adding the phrase financed for the most part by other contracting authorities.

II - Law

(1) Community law

3. In Article 1 of Directive 93/37 contracting authorities are defined as follows:

For the purpose of this directive:

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, [or] associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

A "body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law;

The lists of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph are set out in Annex I....

(c) to (h)....

4. That provision is largely identical to Article 1(b) of Council Directives 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts and 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

5. As far as the United Kingdom is concerned, the list of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law in Annex I includes universities and polytechnics, maintained schools and colleges.

6. The contents of Annex I may be changed in accordance with the procedure set out in Article 35 of Directive 93/37, according to which the Commission may amend the Annex in order to ensure as far as possible that it reflects the actual state of affairs.

(2) National legislation

7. The Community legislation was transposed into national law by the following measures:

- Directive 92/50 by the Public Services Contracts Regulations 1993 (S.I. 1993/3228)

- Directive 93/36 by the Public Supply Contracts Regulations 1995 (S.I. 1995/201)

- Directive 93/37 by the Public Works Contracts Regulations 1991 (S.I. 1991/2680).

8. Those regulations do not reproduce the annex to Directive 93/37 but contain a definition of the bodies governed by public law based on the Community law definition.

III - Facts

9. The Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the Universities in the United Kingdom communicated to the Treasury in 1995 and 1996 its view that the public procurement directives did not apply universally to universities, so that the reference to universities for the United Kingdom in Annex I to Directive 93/37, and to which Directives 92/50, 93/36 and 93/37 refer, should be abandoned.

10. On 17 January 1997, therefore, the Treasury suggested to the Commission that the following amendment be made with regard to universities: universities... financed for the most part by other contracting authorities, thus restricting the circumstances in which the public procurement directives were applicable in the case of universities. The proposal has not yet been implemented by the Commission.

11. The applicant was not satisfied by the amendment suggested by the Treasury, and therefore by application for judicial review dated 7 November 1996 it sought leave from the High Court to challenge the position adopted by the Treasury. Leave was granted on the basis that the application concerned the proper interpretation of the expression financed for the most part by one or more contracting authorities.

12. It was common ground in the main proceedings that most universities in the United Kingdom, in particular the University of Cambridge, were indeed established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and had legal personality; they were not, however, subject to management supervision by contracting authorities, and such bodies did not appoint more than half of the members of the administrative, managerial or supervisory boards of the universities. The only issue in this case, therefore, was whether the universities were financed, for the most part, by one or more contracting authorities.

13. In the order making the reference the national court states inter alia that universities in the United Kingdom are financed in different ways, not all of them receiving funds from contracting authorities. Funds are obtained from a variety of sources, and are provided for a variety of purposes and on various grounds; the way in which funds are obtained also varies.

14. The sources of financing for universities in the United Kingdom, including the applicant, mentioned by the national court include:

1.(a) Funds allocated by the Higher Education Funding Councils and the Teacher Training Agency, which are themselves recognised to be contracting authorities, for academic, research and related activities. More than 90% of the research funding is allocated on the basis of the quality of the research activities, which are periodically assessed. The university itself decides how the funds are to be used.

(b) Funds supplied by the Research Councils, which are likewise recognised to be contracting authorities, to the university on request by individual applicants wishing to conduct a research project in which the Research Councils themselves have no interest at stake, the monies going directly to the university. Grants are allocated to individual applicants on the basis of an appraisal of merit. If the applicant moves to another university, the funding will also move to the new university.

2. Payment for research and services commissioned by and for the benefit of charities, industry, commerce, government departments and other institutions.

3. Tuition fees, which are paid by local education authorities (recognised as contracting authorities) direct to the universities. These funds are in the form of grants to students in respect of the tuition fees payable by them. Many students are eligible for mandatory, or at least discretionary, grants from the paying authorities; others must find the means to pay themselves, or are funded from abroad.

4. Various other sources of financing, such as the provision of residential accommodation and catering, as well as gifts and endowments.

15. The High Court of Justice appended to the reference for a preliminary ruling the following summary of sources of income from the accounts of the university (of Cambridge) for 1997 by percentage of total income:

Funding Council and Teacher Training Agency Grants 30

Academic Fees and Support Grants 14

Of which:

Home and EU students (including some self-supporting) 9

16. The national court considers that a proper understanding of the meaning of financed for the most part is decisive for determining whether a university is to be regarded as a contracting authority, and has therefore referred the following four questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

IV - The questions referred

1. Where Article 1 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC, Council Directive 93/37/EEC and Council Directive 93/36/EEC ("the Directives") refers to any body "financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law" what monies are to be included in the expression "financed... by [one or more contracting authorities]"? In particular, in relation to payments to an entity such as the University of Cambridge, does the expression include:

(a) awards or grants paid by one or more contracting authorities for the support of research work;

(b) consideration paid by one or more contracting authorities for the supply of services comprising research work;

(c) consideration paid by one or more contracting authorities for the supply of other services, such as consultancy or the organisation of conferences;

(d) student grants paid by local education authorities to universities in respect of tuition for named students.

2. What percentage or other meaning is to be given to the expression "for the most part" in Article 1 of the Directives?

3. If the expression "for the most part" is defined in terms of a percentage figure, is the calculation limited to considering sources of finance for academic and related purposes or should it include finance obtained in relation to commercial activities as well?

4. Over what period should any calculation be made for determining whether a university is a "contracting authority" in respect of any particular procurement, and how are foreseeable or future changes to be taken into account?

17. The applicant, the United Kingdom, Netherlands and Austrian Governments, and the Commission took part in the written procedure and the French Government took part in the oral procedure. I shall come back to their observations.

V - Assessment

(1) Preliminary remarks

18. The first point to consider is whether the present reference to universities in the list for the United Kingdom in Annex I to Directive 93/37 or the proposed amendment to it has legal effect as regards this case.

(a) Observations submitted to the Court

19. The view taken by the Netherlands Government, and by the United Kingdom in the oral procedure, is that Annex I is purely declaratory. That is indicated, according to the Netherlands Government, both by Article 35 of Directive 93/37, which provides for a procedure for amending the lists, and from the Commission's answer of 16 June 1992 to written question No 1443/92.

(b) Opinion

20. As the Netherlands Government rightly observes, the definition of a contracting authority is to be that set out in Article 1(b) of the directives. Whether an establishment falls within that definition must be determined solely on the basis of the criteria laid down therein. The fact that it is included in the list is not binding. Article 1(b), which provides that the list is to be as complete as possible, and Article 35 of Directive 93/37, which governs the procedure for changing the list, are sufficient to show that changes are possible and may be required if the bodies listed no longer fulfil the criteria set out in Article 1(b) of the directive. The list is also not exhaustive, but is to be expanded where necessary.

21. The interpretation of Article 1(b), third indent, of the directive is therefore not to be influenced by Annex I to Directive 93/37.

(2) The first question

(a) Observations submitted to the Court

22. The applicant considers that the purpose of Directives 93/36, 93/37 and 92/50 is to impose special requirements on bodies in relation to which the State is in a position to exercise actual or potential control in the procedure for the award of public contracts. It relies in that respect on the case-law of the Court of Justice. The directives serve to prevent distortion of the single market. Where a body is not subject to such control, or where it is merely theoretical, the directives ought not to apply.

23. Whether such control is exercised or not must be ascertained in the applicant's view on the basis of quantitative and qualitative criteria. A body will not be one governed by public law solely because another contracting authority supplies it with a number of financial payments, since not every payment by the contracting authority gives it such control. The purpose of the funding should also be taken into account. The only payment to be regarded as financing by a contracting authority is that which is provided to enable the establishment to fulfil its basic purpose - in the case of a university, teaching and research - and which therefore also enables the contracting authority making the payment to exercise direct or indirect control over public procurement. In this argument the applicant relied at the hearing also on the fact that were a different and broader interpretation to be adopted, churches or religious organisations, for instance, parties, State-funded charitable organisations or State-run lotteries might likewise be taken to be bodies governed by public law if they derived income from public resources. In any event financing denotes payments made in order to enable the university to fulfil its basic purposes. Accordingly, financing for specific research projects or other types of contribution, such as endowments, fall outside the definition. Since, in addition, the sources of funding mentioned in Question 1(a) to (d) of the reference for a preliminary ruling do not provide the contracting authority with any control over public procurement, they are not to be regarded as financing within the meaning of the provision.

24. The United Kingdom Government considers that all funds provided by contracting authorities which serve to fulfil tasks in the sphere of education and thus to meet a need in the general interest fall within the concept of financing by a contracting authority. That does not include commercial payments by a contracting authority, which must thus be left out of account. As to the question whether a payment serves educational or commercial purposes, the judgment in Case 263/86 Belgian State v Humbel is a useful reference.

25. In addition, the United Kingdom Government submitted at the hearing that what ultimately counts is whether a service is provided free, that is to say without any claim for consideration, or as a result of public law duties or, by contrast, under a particular contractual obligation. It relies on the criterion laid down in Mannesmann of close dependency between the body and the contracting authority; in the case of payments which the body has so to speak earned for itself that element is absent. Such payments cannot therefore fall within the concept of financing by a contracting authority.

26. For those reasons, the United Kingdom Government maintains, payments such as those mentioned in Question 1(b) and (c) are purely commercial and therefore to be excluded from the concept of financing by a contracting authority. Payments to the university such as those mentioned in Question 1(a) would fall within the definition, however, even if they were coupled to an application made by an individual applicant. They are ultimately intended to provide the universities with the means to achieve educational and academic aims. Payments by contracting authorities to a university towards tuition fees as described in Question 1(d) also constitute such financing, since they provide the body with the means of fulfilling the task it has in the general interest, even if they are made for specific named students.

27. The Netherlands Government observes that the three criteria set out in Article 1(b), third indent, of the directives, namely financing provided primarily by the State, State supervision and influence in staff appointments, are to be interpreted in the light of the judgment in Mannesmann as close dependency on the State or contracting authorities.

28. It follows that in order to answer the question whether financing by a contracting authority or some other form of contribution is present a distinction must be drawn between financial support and true consideration. Only in the case of the former is the criterion of close dependency fulfilled. The same criterion is used in Article 1(a)(ix) of Directive 92/50, according to which the directive applies only where the payment does not constitute consideration. In the case of Question 1(b) and (c), therefore, it must be ascertained whether what is involved is consideration earned in the marketplace or a financial subsidy. Consequently, payments made in connection with commercial activities will as a rule fall outside the concept of financing by a contracting authority.

29. The Austrian Government refers in suggesting an interpretation to the history of the concept of the contracting authority. The three criteria in Article 1(b), third indent, describe bodies which participate in economic life without being exposed to market forces. Accordingly, the expression financed for the most part by a contracting authority should be given a broad interpretation. It covers all forms of valuable payment containing an element of subsidy made to a body by a contracting authority. The only exception is if the body is obtaining consideration for services offered on the market in competition with other bodies or undertakings, the amount of the consideration being governed by the market itself.

30. Likewise, the French Government observed at the hearing that for the purposes of determining whether there is financing by a contracting authority it is necessary to distinguish between payments made in the general interest and those having the character of consideration for the provision of services. Consequently, of the payments listed in Question 1, those having the character of such consideration must be excluded from the concept of financing by a contracting authority.

31. The Commission also refers to the purpose of the directives, which is to prevent disturbance of the free movement of goods and services. The provision is intended to cover bodies which owing to their close dependency on the State or contracting authorities are not subject to market forces as are others. The decision in Mannesmann has made it clear that the alternative conditions referred to in Article 1(b), third indent, relate to close dependency on the contracting authority. There is such dependency, if only indirect, where financing comes for the most part from a contracting authority. At the hearing the Commission pointed out that even in commercial relationships there may be close dependency. That is taken entirely into account in the purpose of the directives, since even when a contracting authority is acting as a contractual partner it may have a very strong position of influence.

32. The Commission is therefore of the opinion that in the assessment, which must be based on the criterion of close dependency, in principle all payments made by a contracting authority must be taken into account. No distinction should be made according to the activities which form the purpose of the payment, since it is not the purpose of the directive to distinguish between activities in the general interest and other work. In the view of the Commission research awards to particular persons also constitute income for the university and are destined for the purposes of the university. Similarly, payments towards tuition fees for students are intended to provide funds for the university. Any distinction between the types of funding listed in Question 1(a) to (d) is not compatible with the purpose of the directives and would be most difficult in practice to apply.

(b) Opinion

33. The first question to be asked is, what considerations led to the adoption of Article 1(b), third indent, of the directives and what consequences do they have for the interpretation of the concept of financing by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law (which I will also call for the sake of simplicity public financing).

34. The purpose of the directives on the coordination of procedures for the award of public contracts is to remove the risk of considerations other than economic ones influencing the award of public contracts. Bodies which are not subject to the laws of the marketplace are prevented by the directives from giving preference in the award of such contracts to an applicant or tenderer favoured by them. That was what the Court of Justice decided with regard to the directives concerned in this case, Directive 92/50 in BFI Holding and Directive 93/37 in Mannesmann; see also the Opinion of Advocate General Léger in that case, and, with reference to an earlier directive, Directive 71/305/EEC, in Case 31/87.

35. That the notion of a contracting authority is thus to be given a broad meaning based on function, in order to ensure the effectiveness in practice of the principles of the free movement of goods and services, has been confirmed by the Court of Justice on a number of occasions regarding the legal form of the body or the provisions governing it.

36. As regards the determination whether the conditions for a body to be regarded as one governed by public law are satisfied, the Court of Justice described in Mannesmann the three alternative conditions laid down in Article 1(b), third indent, of the directives, which include that of being primarily public-financed, as representing close dependency of the body on the State, a local or regional authority, or other bodies governed by public law. The provision thus defines, according to the Court of Justice, the three manifestations of a body governed by public law as three variants of close dependency on another contracting authority.

37. It is true that in Connemara Machine Turf and Commission v Ireland the Court held that it was necessary, as regards the existence of a contracting authority in Ireland, for there to be control over the award of public supply contracts (and it was also regarded as sufficient for that control to be indirect, that is to say, not expressly provided for). That is what the applicant argues for in this case, too. Those principles, however, are not applicable to this case because the directive at issue in that case, Directive 77/62/EEC, itself imposed the requirement of State control over public supply contracts by means of a reference to the annex in respect of the relevant Member State, which in that case was Ireland.

38. It is also not possible, at least in this case, to apply the conclusions drawn by Advocate General Lenz in Portugal v Commission, which the applicant relies on in support of its argument, since Annex I to the relevant directive (Directive 77/62) requires in the case of Portugal that there be State control over public supply contracts.

39. It is clear that the directives are based on a functional approach, which requires a broad interpretation. In special cases, however, as the Netherlands and Austrian Governments accept, and the United Kingdom also essentially accepts, a teleological approach may be justified. If the funding provided by a contracting authority cannot give rise to, or reinforce, any particular dependency, the purpose of the directives no longer serves to justify the inclusion of such funding as public financing, a concept intended precisely to cover only cases where there is a special link between the body and the contracting authority.

40. It is therefore necessary also to clarify the meaning of financing in order to be able to conclude that there is close dependency between the recipient and the provider of the payment. As the Commission also rightly observes, such dependency exists in the case of public financing only indirectly. As a result, it is not possible to regard every payment from public sources automatically as public financing, which only covers funding which does not constitute payment for a particular consideration, that is to say, which amounts to a financial subsidy to fund or support the general activities of the establishment in question.

41. Funding such as that mentioned in Question 1(a), in the form of grants in support of research, must therefore be regarded as public financing. Even if the actual recipient is not the establishment itself, but a person supplying services as part of the university, it is nevertheless financing which benefits the establishment as a whole. Precisely in this case there is one of the relationships defined by the directive, there being close dependency between the university and the contracting authority providing the finance.

42. It is questionable, however, whether that extends, in accordance with the principles set out above, to the payments referred to Question 1(b) and (c). The purpose of the payment, the criterion suggested by the United Kingdom Government inter alia, is not sufficient to determine whether public financing includes consideration paid by a contracting authority for services provided by the university under contract. In Humbel the Court decided that teaching services did not fall within the scope of services for the purposes of Articles 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty (now Articles 49 EC and 50 EC). However, the Court distinguished between the case where there was economic consideration for a service and that where payment was made for the fulfilment by the State of an obligation incumbent upon it in the social, cultural and educational sphere. The reason for that given by the Court was that the protection which freedom to provide services was designed to afford did not extend to the latter sphere. The question whether a payment falls in this case under the heading of public financing cannot be answered on that basis, however, since the protection which the directives are designed to afford (described above) is one entirely different to that afforded by freedom to provide services. The fact is that the nature of the payment as consideration raises precisely the question whether it is possible for there to be close dependency even where the service provided by the establishment nevertheless serves purposes which are in the general interest. That criterion makes it more difficult, moreover, to draw the distinction, since activities which are in the general interest, that is to say, in the case of a university, education and research services, may overlap with activities of a commercial character, as Question 1(b) shows.

43. In the same way, it is not possible to apply by analogy the principles developed by the Court of Justice in BFI Holding. In that case the Court decided, with regard to Article 1(b), second subparagraph, first indent, of Directive 92/50, that the fact that services were also supplied by private undertakings or could be supplied by them did not prevent a task from being one that was in the general interest. At first sight, the judgment might be taken to indicate that a distinction between commercial and other services cannot be made in the case of public financing under the third indent, either. However, the three cumulative criteria for defining a body governed by public law raise quite different issues. The separate issue raised here is whether particular payments to a body which was undoubtedly established for the purpose of meeting needs in the general interest are to be regarded as public financing.

44. If one is to be guided by the purpose of the directives and by the question whether close dependency between university and contracting authority is created or reinforced, the answer must be that it is not public financing if the combined effect of the service and the consideration paid is that the contracting authority has an economic interest in obtaining the service which goes beyond support for the needs to be served in the general interest. There can only be close dependency if the purpose of the payment is to support the tasks of an establishment and to aid it for that purpose. That can only be the case if a service provided by the establishment under contract is at the same time an activity which is performed in the general interest or which serves academic purposes.

45. As a rule such dependency does not arise precisely where an establishment receives payment as consideration for an activity which it offers in the same way as an undertaking operating on the market independently in competition with private undertakings and on the basis of a specific agreement for the supply of services. That is because the establishment acquires its entitlement to payment on a reciprocal basis. The services are supplied on request in the interest of the establishment, as in the case of research for specific purposes, consultancy or the organisation of conferences. The right to obtain services is therefore not based on the decision of principle to support the establishment in its duties, but is rather a contractual entitlement.

46. A business relationship of that type can, of course, give rise to dependency, but that dependency is not of the same kind as that which arises from the mere provision of support. The dependency between business partners, even where one is technically a contracting authority, is not close dependency for the purposes of the directives, since in the case of freely negotiated contracts performance by both parties takes the form of do ut des. Any other approach to this question would lead to the paradoxical result that even a private undertaking conducting most of its business with contracting authorities would be a contracting authority for the purposes of the procurement directives.

47. Since the payments referred to in Question 1(b) and (c) are made in respect of a claim based on an autonomous contractual foundation and do not therefore create close dependency on a contracting authority within the meaning of the directive, they do not constitute public financing.

48. The last question to be discussed in this regard is whether tuition fees, as described in Question 1(d), paid by the contracting authority to a university for named students may be counted as public financing.

49. It is true that such payments also constitute a social measure for individual students, for whom it represents a grant towards the sometimes very high tuition fees. Nevertheless, it constitutes a reliable source of income for the establishment from public funds, which accrue to the university. The test for whether there is dependency is that the establishment obtains support from the contracting authority, for which, moreover, there is no contractual consideration. Accordingly, a contribution such as that referred to in Question 1(d) falls within the concept of public financing.

50. Naturally that excludes tuition fees paid by the student himself from private means, which do not involve any contribution from a contracting authority. Likewise excluded are funds provided from abroad by way of grants or other forms of support for students.

(3) The second question

51. The second question seeks to know how the expression for the most part in Article 1 of the directives is to be understood.

(a) Observations submitted to the Court

52. The applicant considers that in view of its position on the first question it is not necessary to answer the second. Solely in the alternative, it submits that the expression for the most part should be interpreted not on the basis of purely quantitative criteria but rather on the basis of qualitative criteria, with the result that only financing which confers on the payer control over procurement decisions is to be included. In any event, as regards the quantitative aspect, the test cannot be a purely mathematical one: there must be a predominant amount of such financing, which, in the applicant's view, can only be present where the financing amounts to at least three-quarters of the total.

53. The Netherlands, Austrian and United Kingdom Governments, together with the Commission, consider rather that for the most part must be taken to have its natural meaning of over 50%. The French Government supported that view at the hearing.

54. The United Kingdom Government argues that if the financing provided by the contracting authority exceeds 50%, there should be control over the use of those funds by the financing body. That is the approach taken in Article 2(1) of Directive 93/37, according to which the directive extends to contracting authorities who subsidise by more than 50% a contract awarded by a different body.

55. The Netherlands Government considers that that approach is also justified on systematic grounds, since there is another instance in Article 1(b), third indent, of the directives where a simple majority is determinative: where more than half the members of an administrative, managerial or supervisory board are appointed by the board there is assumed to be dependency. In addition, the definition of a public undertaking in Article 1(2) of Directive 93/38/EEC, and the definition of an affiliated undertaking in the third subparagraph of Article 3(4) of Directive 93/37 and in Article 1(3) of Directive 93/38 can also be referred to for comparison, each of them employing the criterion of more than half.

56. The Commission considers that taking the expression to mean more than 50% is a simple test to apply and also follows logically from the fact that the assessment is based on only two aspects, financing from contracting authorities and financing from other sources.

57. The ordinary meaning of the words for the most part suggests that they should be interpreted as referring to an arithmetical more, that is to say over half or more than 50%. Even if the words are not considered to be unequivocal in that respect, any interpretation such as that suggested by the applicant, for instance depending on funds of a particular sort, would not meet the purpose of the provision. It must be borne in mind that close dependency, with the corresponding possibility of influence, might arise in certain circumstances even where the financing is less than 50%, if it comes as a single contribution among a large number of smaller amounts. A qualitative approach is therefore not an appropriate one for determining the meaning of for the most part because of the many imponderables it raises. The possibility need not be discussed here, since all that is necessary is to establish the meaning of for the most part. What is required is a practical interpretation which satisfies the purpose of the provision.

58. We can also refer to the definition in Article 1(2) of Directive 93/38, in which public undertaking is defined inter alia as an undertaking in which the State owns, directly or indirectly, at least half of the capital. If that quantitative criterion is what makes an undertaking a public undertaking, it must certainly apply to a body governed by public law, when determining the conditions under which financing is to be regarded as for the most part public.

(4) The third question

59. The issue of what contributions fall within the concept of financing by a contracting authority has already been dealt with in connection with the first question. The third question posed by the national court, namely what funds are to be included in the calculation, should therefore not be understood as meaning what kind of funds should be taken into account in calculating the public financing, but as asking what is to be the basis for calculating the whole financing. In other words, it asks how to define the total income, of which the funds provided by public financing are to constitute the most part.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(a) Observations submitted to the Court

60. The applicant and the United Kingdom Government argue that the calculation should cover all income. The French Government supported that view at the hearing.

(b) Opinion

61. In referring to financing for the most part from public funds, Article 1(b), third indent, implies that the institution can obtain funds at least partly from other sources without forfeiting its identity as a contracting authority. Any reliable assessment of the proportion of public financing when considering the economy of the institution as a whole must take account of all funding in the assessment of its income. Consequently, in order to calculate the total income (100%) of which over 50% is to be public financing, all resources accruing to the institution must be taken into account.

(5) The fourth question

62. Since universities' financing may vary from year to year, the national court seeks by means of the fourth question to know what period should be used as the basis for deciding whether an institution is to be classed as a body governed by public law, and how foreseeable or future changes in funding are to be taken into account.

(a) Observations submitted to the Court

63. The applicant suggests that the relevant time is the time of the contract award procedure.

64. The United Kingdom Government submits that for practical reasons it should occur a priori at the time of the award procedure. It refers to the possibility of taking interim measures under Directive 89/665/EEC, which would have no purpose if the status of an institution as being a body governed by public law were only to be made at a later date. At the hearing it suggested that the assessment could be a yearly one. Bodies wishing to award a contract must be able to determine the situation on the basis of the information available to them at that time, which would include figures from past years as well as a reasonable estimate of the duration of the contract and the funds already committed. The element of prognosis is one which is to be found in the three directives.

65. The Austrian Government considers that the assessment must be made for given periods, and suggests an annual approach, since contracting authorities draw up their budgets annually. Reference might be made to the calendar, accounting or budgetary year. That would also be appropriate in view of the fact that a yearly assessment is also made in other cases (Article 7(6) and the notification provisions in Article 15(1) of Directive 92/50).

66. The Commission takes the view that Article 15(1) of Directive 92/50 and Article 9(1) of Directive 93/36 indicate that contracting authorities retain their status for 12 months. Whether a body is a contracting authority or not may thus change from one budgetary year to another. Accordingly, it suggests that the determination be made annually on the basis of anticipated sources of finance for the coming budgetary year.

67. The Netherlands Government considers that the assessment should be made rather on structural lines, since any other approach would be incompatible with the principle of legal certainty.

68. The French Government supported that view at the hearing. The difficulties of application and the considerable uncertainty which would arise particularly in the case of more lengthy award procedures could only be overcome by adopting a structural approach. Any other approach might have the result of making the status of the body vary in the course of the award procedure purely as a result of temporary and short-term changes in funding.

(b) Opinion

69. That the fundamental general principle of legal certainty in Community law applies when classifying financing was upheld by the Court of Justice in Mannesmann. The principle requires that provisions be clear and their application foreseeable by all those concerned. Accordingly, the application of objective and transparent criteria for determining the status of a body as being one governed by public law must be decisive.

70. Determining status on the basis of structural elements would admittedly have the advantage of legal certainty and clarity; it would not, however, enable actual or future variations in funding to be taken into account. Isolated instances of public funding, for example for building projects, would then be disregarded, contrary to the intention of the directive.

71. Taking the time of the procurement procedure as the time at which status is to be determined likewise does not necessarily reflect longer-term, and thus actual, financing. It would also open the way to manipulation.

72. Annual reassessment of their status, by contrast, might not offer the foreseeability required by the principle of legal certainty, since the status of the institution could change from year to year depending on the sources of its financing.

73. On the other hand, the basis for making the abovementioned calculations must be certain, correct and transparent. It ought therefore to be reasonable to do it on an annual basis in any event; not for a year in the past calculated from the time of the procurement procedure, however, but for the budgetary year in which the contract is awarded. For reasons of legal certainty and protection of tenderers that should be expanded, however, in order to ensure that in the course of the procurement procedure the establishment retains until completion of the contract the status it had at the time of the award procedure, even if the contract extends over a period of more than a budgetary year in the course of which the institution's financing changes.

74. The new assessment of the financing for the purposes of determining the establishment's status is only to be undertaken within a budgetary year (also to prevent manipulation) in the case of significant changes in funding which have already occurred or in the case of foreseeable future changes.

VI - Conclusion

75. In the light of those considerations I suggest the following answers to the questions which have been referred for a preliminary ruling:

(1) The expression financed for the most part by one or more contracting authorities in Article 1 of Council Directives 92/50/EEC, 93/37/EEC and 93/36/EEC covers in principle all funding provided by the State, regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law to a body for the purpose of providing financial support for that body. Payments made by a contracting authority as consideration for services offered on competitive conditions by the body in the context of a reciprocal contract do not constitute public financing for the purpose of the directives.

(a) Research grants made by one or more contracting authorities to support research are covered by the expression financing by one or more contracting authorities.

(b) Payments made by one or more contracting authorities under a specific contract for the supply of services as consideration for the supply of services or for research work, and

(c) for the supply of other services, such as consultancy or the organisation of conferences, do not constitute financing by one or more contracting authorities.

(d) Student grants paid by local education authorities to universities in respect of tuition for named students constitute financing by one or more contracting authorities.

(2) For the most part means more than 50%.

(3) Whether financing is for the most part is determined on the basis of all funds accruing to the body.

(4) Whether a body is to be regarded as one governed by public law is to be determined on the basis of the budgetary year of the procurement procedure. The status should be reviewed if there are significant changes in the way in which the body is financed during the budgetary year.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Jacobs delivered on 14 June 2001.
Kingdom of the Netherlands v European Parliament and Council of the European Union.
Annulment - Directive 98/44/EC - Legal protection of biotechnological inventions - Legal basis - Article 100a of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 95 EC), Article 235 of the EC Treaty (now Article 308 EC) or Articles 130 and 130f of the EC Treaty (now Articles 157 EC and 163 EC) - Subsidiarity - Legal certainty - Obligations of Member States under international law - Fundamental rights - Human dignity - Principle of collegiality for draft legislation of the Commission.
Case C-377/98.

1. In this case the Netherlands has brought an action under Article 173 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 230 EC) seeking annulment of Directive 98/44 on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions.

The Directive

2. Chapter I (Articles 1 to 7) of the Directive is entitled Patentability.

3. The Directive requires Member States to protect biotechnological inventions under national patent law. Although there is no definition of biotechnological inventions, it is clear that the concept essentially comprises inventions concerning a product consisting of or containing biological material or a process by means of which biological material is produced, processed or used or inventions concerning a microbiological or other technical process or a product obtained by means of such a process. Microbiological process is defined as any process involving or performed upon or resulting in microbiological material. Biological material is defined as any material containing genetic information and capable of reproducing itself or being reproduced in a biological system. Biological material which is isolated from its natural environment or produced by means of a technical process may be the subject of an invention even if it previously occurred in nature; similarly an element isolated from the human body or otherwise produced by means of a technical process, including the sequence or partial sequence of a gene, may constitute a patentable invention, even if the structure of that element is identical to that of a natural element.

4. The Directive provides that the following may not be patented: (i) plant and animal varieties; (ii) essentially biological processes for the production of plants or animals; (iii) the human body, at the various stages of its formation and development, and the simple discovery of one of its elements, including the sequence or partial sequence of a gene; and (iv) inventions the commercial exploitation of which would be contrary to ordre public or morality. Examples of the latter are (a) processes for cloning human beings; (b) processes for modifying the germ line genetic identity of human beings; (c) uses of human embryos for industrial or commercial purposes; and (d) processes for modifying the genetic identity of animals which are likely to cause them suffering without any substantial medical benefit to man or animal, and animals resulting from such processes.

5. Chapter II of the Directive (Articles 8 to 11) concerns the scope of protection conferred by a patent. Chapter III (Article 12) concerns compulsory cross-licensing. Chapter IV (Articles 13 and 14) concerns the deposit and re-deposit of and access to a biological material. Chapter V (Articles 15 to 18) contains final provisions. The provisions of these chapters are referred to below as appropriate.

6. The Directive has a relatively long history, although the version finally adopted went through the legislative process with impressive speed.

7. In 1988 the Commission presented its first proposal for a Council Directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions. The proposed Directive started from the premiss that a subject matter of an invention shall not be considered unpatentable for the reason only that it is composed of living matter. That proposal ultimately foundered, principally because of the Parliament's resistance to an instrument which articulated no fundamental ethical principles governing the grant of patents in the context of animate matter.

8. In 1996 the Commission presented a fresh proposal. After substantial amendments proposed by the Parliament, it was adopted on 6 July 1998. The Netherlands voted against the Directive; Italy and Belgium abstained. The Directive required implementation by 30 July 2000.

9. There are 56 recitals in the preamble to the Directive as adopted, in contrast to a mere 18 articles, not all substantive. Many of the recitals are clearly designed to counter objections raised by the Parliament, both to the 1996 proposal and to the 1988 proposal. Not all the recitals are reflected in the articles of the Directive. The recitals and the substantive provisions of the Directive are considered further below in the context of the various heads of the Netherlands' claims.

The action for annulment

10. The Netherlands has challenged the validity of the Directive. It is clear from its application that its objection is in essence to the notion that plants, animals and parts of the human body may be patentable. The Netherlands considers that the right to a patent in the field of biotechnology should be limited to the biotechnological process and not extended to the products deriving therefrom: in other words, neither plants and animals as such, including genetically modified plants and animals, nor human biological material should be patentable.

11. The grounds invoked for the annulment of the Directive are that it (i) is incorrectly based on Article 100a of the Treaty; (ii) is contrary to the principle of subsidiarity; (iii) infringes the principle of legal certainty; (iv) is incompatible with international obligations; (v) breaches fundamental rights; and (vi) was not properly adopted since the definitive version of the proposal submitted to the Parliament and the Council was not decided on by the college of Commissioners.

12. As will be seen, some of the above grounds concern the interpretation and effect of the Directive in technical areas: thus for example the second head of the third ground questions the scope of the exclusion from patentability of plant and animal varieties. Other grounds raise substantive issues of broader import, such as the compatibility of the Directive with fundamental rights and with other international obligations. Finally, the first, second and sixth grounds concern more formal issues relating to the adoption of the Directive. Even those grounds, however, involve important issues of principle: one of the arguments in the context of the correct legal basis, for example, raises the question whether the Directive, by providing for a patent on life, creates a new intellectual property right. I propose to deal with the grounds for annulment in the order in which the Netherlands has presented them in its application, although other approaches can equally be envisaged.

13. The Netherlands is supported by Italy (whose written observations in intervention focus on the first and third grounds for annulment) and Norway (whose observations focus on the first, third and fourth grounds). The Parliament and Council are supported by the Commission (whose observations are limited to the sixth ground).

14. Two procedural matters should be mentioned at this point.

15. First, on 6 July 2000 the Netherlands lodged an application for interim measures, principally seeking suspension of operation of the Directive until the Court had ruled on the application for annulment. The European Parliament and the Council submitted written observations on the application for interim measures. A hearing was held on 18 July 2000 at which the Netherlands, the Parliament and the Council together with Italy and the Commission, which had both been granted leave to intervene, were present. The application for interim measures was dismissed by order of the President of the Court of 25 July 2000.

16. Second, the Council and the Parliament submit as a preliminary point that Norway's statement in intervention is inadmissible. Article 37 of the Statute of the Court of Justice requires an application to intervene by a State which is party to the Agreement on the European Economic Area to be limited to supporting the form of order sought by one of the parties. Article 93(5)(a) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court similarly requires that the statement in intervention contain a statement of the form of order sought by the intervener in support of or opposing, in whole or in part, the form of order sought by one of the parties. In the present case, the Netherlands seeks the annulment of the Directive. In the introduction to its statement in intervention, Norway states that the Netherlands raises several questions which may have a bearing on whether or not the Directive falls within the area covered by the EEA Agreement, and on the implementation of the Directive into the EEA Agreement. It is nowhere stated that Norway is intervening in support of the form of order sought by the Netherlands. The conclusion of the statement in intervention is as follows:

Several of the questions presented by the Government of the Netherlands in its action for annulment of Directive 98/44/EC may have a bearing on whether or not the Directive falls within the EEA Agreement and on the implementation of the Directive into the EEA Agreement. Norway, therefore, respectfully requests that the Court take due account of the arguments set forth herein.

17. The Council adds that in any event Norway's observations in intervention have been largely overtaken by events, since Article 3(4) of Protocol 28 to the EEA Agreement requires the EFTA States to comply in their law with the substantive provisions of the European Patent Convention and since those provisions now include the provisions of the Directive (see further below).

18. I do not agree with the Council and the Parliament that Norway's statement in intervention is inadmissible. Norway explicitly stated in its application to intervene that it wished to intervene in support of the Netherlands. It is apparent from its statement in intervention, even if it is not explicitly stated, that Norway supports the Netherlands' arguments that Article 100a was the incorrect legal basis for the Directive, that the Directive infringes the principle of legal certainty and that it is incompatible with the Convention on Biological Diversity. It is also stated that the effect of such incompatibility is in the view of Norway that the Directive would have to be repealed, which may be taken to mean annulled, and that the consequence of the infringement of the principle of legal certainty is that the Directive should be annulled. I accordingly consider that Norway's statement in intervention is admissible.

The context of the Directive - patent law

19. A patent is a legal right conferred on an inventor in respect of a specific invention and entitling him to prevent others from making, using or selling the invention for the duration of the patent. Most developed legal systems have had a system of patent law for some time. The earliest known English patent, for example, was granted by Henry VI to Flemish-born John of Utynam in 1449. The patent conferred a 20-year monopoly for a method of making stained glass, required for the windows of Eton college, that had not been previously known in England.

20. Modern patent systems tend to impose more or less uniform requirements for the grant of a patent. Those requirements may be illustrated by the European Patent Convention, which came into force in 1978. Although not a Community instrument, since all Member States of the Union are parties to the Convention it in effect unifies the conditions for the grant of a patent throughout the Union.

21. The Convention establishes a system of law, common to the Contracting States, for the grant of patents for invention. A patent granted by virtue of the Convention is called a European patent and in each Contracting State for which it is granted has the effect of and is subject to the same conditions as a national patent granted by that State. Enforcement of a patent granted by virtue of the Convention is thus regulated not by the Convention but by national law and procedure.

22. A European patent is to be granted for any inventions which are susceptible of industrial application, which are new and which involve an inventive step. A European patent is not however to be granted in respect of:

(a) inventions the publication or exploitation of which would be contrary to ordre public or morality, provided that the exploitation shall not be deemed to be so contrary merely because it is prohibited by law or regulation in some or all of the Contracting States;

(b) plant or animal varieties or essentially biological processes for the production of plants or animals; this provision does not apply to microbiological processes or the products thereof.

23. The same criteria are used to define patentable subject-matter in the TRIPs Agreement, although the exclusions from patentability are there set out as options.

24. A further feature common to modern patent systems is a requirement that the patent application disclose the invention in a manner sufficiently clear and complete for it to be carried out by a person skilled in the art. The description must include a detailed account of at least one way of carrying out the invention claimed and a statement of how the invention is capable of industrial application. Since patent applications are normally published, the sum of knowledge in the public domain is increased with each patent. Although that knowledge cannot of course be used by a third party for the duration of the patent to reproduce the invention, since that will normally constitute infringement, it can be built on and lead to further inventions.

25. Once conferred, a patent merely entitles the holder to prevent others from making, using or selling the patented invention in the territory in which the patent has effect. It confers no right of ownership as such, nor any absolute right to manufacture or otherwise exploit the invention. Thus the holder of a patent will still need to comply with national law when he makes, uses or sells his invention. He may for example need to obtain a licence or authorisation; he may even patent an invention (a type of weapon for example) the making, use or sale of which is prohibited by national law.

26. An example illustrates this point. Suppose that a superior type of copying machine were patented and that its enhanced performance meant that it could produce high quality counterfeit bank notes. The existence of a patent (which would be granted under most patent systems, including the European Patent Convention, on the basis that not all uses of the invention were contrary to ordre public or morality) would not of course legalise such use.

27. Normally, only exploitation for industrial and commercial purposes constitutes infringement of a patent, and patent laws specify that certain acts do not constitute infringement. Experimental use is one such exception: experiments aimed at perfecting, improving or further developing protected inventions do not infringe the patent.

The context of the Directive - biotechnology

28. Biotechnology is defined in the 1993 edition of the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary as the industrial application of biological processes. The Encyclopaedia Britannica defines it as the application to industry of advances made in the techniques and instruments of research in the biological sciences. For the purposes of the Convention on Biological Diversity it is defined as any technological application that uses biological systems, living organisms, or derivatives thereof, to make or modify products or processes for specific use.

29. Biotechnology in that broad sense is as old as bread, wine, beer and cheese. Historically, biotechnological inventions such as processes using yeasts and fermentation were typically regarded as patentable: there was thus no general prohibition on patents involving such basic types of living matter although more sophisticated living matter was normally excluded from patentability by express provision or case-law.

30. Biotechnology in the modern sense of genetic manipulation was made possible by the remarkable advances in biochemistry, molecular biology and genetics in the latter half of the 20th century. The discovery in 1953 by Francis Crick and James Watson of the structure of DNA paved the way for further discoveries. Each DNA molecule is constructed as a double helix, or paired spirals, linked by bases of which there are four kinds. The nucleus of a cell contains several threads of DNA, called chromosomes. A gene is a segment of a chromosome, and hence a length of DNA, which contains the instructions to make a part of a protein. The sequence of the bases of the DNA contained in a cell makes up the genetic code of that cell. Cells need numerous different proteins in order to develop and function. Genes are responsible for particular proteins with their own function in living cells. When instructing a cell how to make a particular protein, part of the DNA helix is temporarily unzipped (the two strands separate) so that an imprint of its code may be copied into an RNA molecule (ribonucleic acid). That copy moves out of the nucleus and instructs the cell to assemble a protein or part of a protein.

31. DNA is present in all organisms (except for some viruses); it is accordingly possible to transfer a gene between unrelated species and even across genera and orders, for example between plants, bacteria, humans and other animals. Thus in principle any genetic characteristic of one organism can be transferred to another organism.

32. In the 1970s a method was discovered of extracting specific genes and parts of genes from chromosomes by restriction enzymes, which like biological scissors excise a fragment of DNA from a cell. The DNA can then be inserted into bacterial, viral or yeast cells by a laboratory procedure. A single gene (or several genes) can accordingly be transferred between organisms. The cells incorporating the foreign DNA can be grown in enormous numbers, cloning the imported fragment of DNA.

33. This type of recombinant DNA genetic engineering has made possible a number of processes of unquestionable benefit to mankind, such as the large-scale production of insulin for treating diabetes, interferon and other drugs for treating certain cancers, vaccines against diseases such as hepatitis B, the human growth hormone for the treatment of certain forms of dwarfism and the clotting factor missing in haemophilia.

34. Gene transfer is a different method of gene technology. Segments of DNA containing a specific gene or genes are first isolated as above and then incorporated into the DNA of a fertilised egg or, later, into embryonic cells. The new gene will be present in the adult organism and will be inherited by some descendants of that organism.

35. Cloning is a process whereby the nucleus of an unfertilised egg is removed and replaced with the nucleus of a somatic cell (namely a cell from an animal or plant other than the reproductive cells), which contains all the genetic material. If the treated egg survives and develops, the resulting animal will be a genetic clone of the animal which was the source of the somatic cell.

36. The biotechnological industry began to develop seriously after a decision by the US Supreme Court in 1980 that a live, human-made micro-organism is patentable subject matter. That case concerned an invention of a human-made, genetically engineered bacterium capable of breaking down crude oil. The Supreme Court held (by a 5:4 majority) that the micro-organism constituted a manufacture or composition of matter within the meaning of the Patent Act 1952. The Court noted that the Committee Reports accompanying the 1952 Act indicated that Congress intended statutory subject matter to include anything under the sun that is made by man.

37. That ruling prompted the establishment of a number of commercial firms that manufacture quantities of gene-engineered substances for a variety of mostly medical and ecological uses.

38. In the 1980s Harvard University applied under the European Patent Convention for a patent for a mouse genetically engineered to contain a gene sequence making it more susceptible to cancer. In 1990 the Technical Board of Appeal of the European Patent Office ruled that the exception to patentability under Article 53(b) of the European Patent Convention applied to certain categories of animals but not to animals as such: it noted that Article 53(b), as an exception, must be narrowly construed. The patent was accordingly granted.

39. Developments in genetic engineering have caused concern in many quarters. Clearly technology which enables the genetic make-up of animals and humans to be modified and which has the potential to create human clones calls for careful regulation. Much of the understandable anxiety about the consequences of insufficiently regulated research in the field has been directed against legislation - such as the Directive - which governs the patentability of such inventions. Many commentators start from the assumption that such legislation means that any gene or gene sequence, or even the entire human genome, can now automatically be patented. That assumption is incorrect. The Directive leaves untouched the classic requirements for a patent of novelty, inventive step and industrial application. The mere discovery of a gene or gene sequence is no more patentable under the Directive than it was before.

The arguments as to legal basis

40. The Directive is based on Article 100a of the Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 95 EC), paragraph 1 of which requires the Council to adopt, by qualified majority and in accordance with the codecision procedure laid down in Article 189b (now Article 250 EC), measures for the approximation of the provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in Member States which have as their object the establishment and functioning of the internal market.

41. The Netherlands, supported by Italy, submits that Article 100a is not the correct legal basis for the Directive on several grounds and that, if it was considered necessary to regulate biotechnological inventions, Article 235 of the EC Treaty (now Article 308 EC), which requires unanimity, should have been used.

The relevant recitals and provisions of the Directive

42. The preamble to the Directive includes the following recitals:

(1) Whereas biotechnology and genetic engineering are playing an increasingly important role in a broad range of industries and the protection of biotechnological inventions will certainly be of fundamental importance for the Community's industrial development;

(2) Whereas, in particular in the field of genetic engineering, research and development require a considerable amount of high-risk investment and therefore only adequate legal protection can make them profitable;

(3) Whereas effective and harmonised protection throughout the Member States is essential in order to maintain and encourage investment in the field of biotechnology;

(5) Whereas differences exist in the legal protection of biotechnological inventions offered by the laws and practices of the different Member States; whereas such differences could create barriers to trade and hence impede the proper functioning of the internal market;

(6) Whereas such differences could well become greater as Member States adopt new and different legislation and administrative practices, or [as] national case-law interpreting such legislation

develops differently;

(7) Whereas uncoordinated development of national laws on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions in the Community could lead to further disincentives to trade, to the detriment of the industrial development of such inventions and of the smooth operation of the internal market;

(8) Whereas legal protection of biotechnological inventions does not necessitate the creation of a separate body of law in place of the rules of national patent law; whereas the rules of national patent law remain the essential basis for the legal protection of biotechnological inventions given that they must be adapted or added to in certain specific respects in order to take adequate account of technological developments involving biological material which also fulfil the requirements for patentability;

(9) Whereas in certain cases, such as the exclusion from patentability of plant and animal varieties and of essentially biological processes for the production of plants and animals, certain concepts in national laws based upon international patent and plant variety conventions have created uncertainty regarding the protection of biotechnological and certain microbiological inventions; whereas harmonisation is necessary to clarify the said uncertainty;

(14) Whereas a patent for invention does not authorise the holder to implement that invention, but merely entitles him to prohibit third parties from exploiting it for industrial and commercial purposes; whereas, consequently, substantive patent law cannot serve to replace or render superfluous national, European or international law which may impose restrictions or prohibitions or which concerns the monitoring of research and of the use or commercialisation of its results, notably from the point of view of the requirements of public health, safety, environmental protection, animal welfare, the preservation of genetic diversity and compliance with certain ethical standards.

43. Article 1 of the Directive provides:

1. Member States shall protect biotechnological inventions under national patent law. They shall, if necessary, adjust their national patent law to take account of the provisions of the Directive.

2. This Directive shall be without prejudice to the obligations of the Member States pursuant to international agreements, and in particular the TRIPs Agreement and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

44. Article 11 of the Directive provides:

1. By way of derogation from Articles 8 and 9, the sale or other form of commercialisation of plant propagating material to a farmer by the holder of the patent or with his consent for agricultural use implies authorisation for the farmer to use the product of his harvest for propagation or multiplication by him on his own farm, the extent and conditions of this derogation corresponding to those under Article 14 of Regulation (EC) No 2100/94.

2. By way of derogation from Articles 8 and 9, the sale or any other form of commercialisation of breeding stock or other animal reproductive material to a farmer by the holder of the patent or with his consent implies authorisation for the farmer to use the protected livestock for an agricultural purpose. This includes making the animal or other animal reproductive material available for the purposes of pursuing his agricultural activity but not sale within the framework or for the purpose of a commercial reproduction activity.

3. The extent and the conditions of the derogation provided for in paragraph 2 shall be determined by national laws, regulations and practices.

The arguments that obstacles to trade have not been shown

45. First, the Netherlands submits that, even if it is assumed that, as stated in recitals five and six in the preamble, there are actual or potential differences in national laws on the patenting of biotechnological inventions, it has not been proved that such differences in fact hinder or can hinder trade. Even if they did, the obstacles would be to trade with the United States and Japan, where the manufacture and patenting of biotechnological inventions is more advanced, and not within the internal market. In the absence of any evidence of differences in national laws or of effect on trade, harmonisation by way of a directive cannot be justified.

46. The Council and the Parliament refer to the Court's ruling in Spain v Council that recourse to Article 100a is justified where harmonising measures are necessary to deal with disparities between the laws of the Member States in areas where such disparities are liable to create or maintain distorted conditions of competition [or] in so far as such disparities are liable to hinder the free movement of goods within the Community. In that case, the Court confirmed the validity of a regulation concerning the creation of a supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products adopted on the basis of Article 100a. The Court noted that, according to the Council, at the time the contested regulation was adopted provisions concerning the creation of a supplementary protection certificate for medicinal products existed in two Member States and were at the draft stage in another State. The regulation was intended to establish a uniform Community approach. It thus aimed to prevent the heterogeneous development of national laws leading to further disparities which would be likely to create obstacles to the free movement of medicinal products within the Community and thus directly affect the establishment and functioning of the internal market.

47. I would note that the above principles laid down in Spain v Council have more recently been refined by the Court in Germany v Parliament and Council. In that case the Court stated that, while recourse to Article 100a as a legal basis was possible if the aim was to prevent the emergence of future obstacles to trade resulting from multifarious development of national laws, the emergence of such obstacles must be likely and the measure in question must be designed to prevent them. With regard to the measure's effect on competition, the Court stated that it was required to verify whether the distortion of competition which the measure purported to eliminate was appreciable and thus whether the measure actually contributed to eliminating appreciable distortions of competition. With regard to the measure's effect on the free movement of goods, the Court appears to have been less exacting: it is sufficient that obstacles to free movement may well arise. Although it had been demonstrated that no obstacle existed at the material time, the Court accepted that in view of the trend in national legislation... it is probable that obstacles to the free movement of... products will arise in the future and that in principle a harmonising measure could be adopted on the basis of Article 100a.

48. The Court has made it clear since an early stage that, in the absence of harmonisation, the national character of the protection of industrial property and the variations between the different legislative systems are capable of creating obstacles both to the free movement of patented products and to competition within the common market. It has moreover consistently recognised that the specific subject matter of a patent is the guarantee that the patentee, to reward the creative effort of the inventor, has the exclusive right to use an invention with a view to manufacturing industrial products and putting them into circulation for the first time, as well as the right to oppose infringements. Patents thus promote competition through innovation. Indeed the Netherlands implicitly recognises this, noting that the manufacture of biotechnological inventions is more advanced in the United States and Japan where, as mentioned above, biotechnological inventions have been readily patentable since 1980 and 1981 respectively. Heterogeneous and potentially or actually divergent national laws on legal protection, patentability, the extent of protection, derogations and limitations are clearly liable to distort competition within the Community and moreover to hinder the free movement of goods. Different levels of protection for an identical product would lead to fragmentation of the market into national markets where the product would be protected and others where it would not; the common market would not be a single environment for the economic activities of undertakings. The Court has explicitly recognised this in the context of intellectual property rights.

49. I accordingly conclude that the Council and Parliament were entitled to take the view that a harmonising measure was necessary to deal with disparities between the laws of the Member States concerning the patent protection of biotechnological inventions.

50. With regard to the Netherlands' argument that the Directive seeks in particular to make European industry more competitive vis-à-vis the United States and Japan, I agree with the Parliament that it is consistent with Article 100a that the harmonisation sought should improve the competitive position of European undertakings on the world market. Although that objective could be seen as an industrial policy objective, I have no doubt that it can lawfully guide the Community's action. Some would argue that similar considerations underlie the entire internal market programme, as it was conceived in 1985, and competition in world markets has often been said to motivate that programme. I would also point out that the EC Treaty now contains a title on industry, according to which the action of the Community and of the Member States shall also be aimed at fostering better exploitation of the industrial potential of policies of innovation, research and technological development (Article 130(1), now Article 157(1) EC). In Article 130(3) of the EC Treaty (now Article 157(3) EC) it is further stated that the Community shall contribute to the achievement of the objectives set out in paragraph 1 through the policies and activities it pursues under other provisions of this Treaty.

The argument that Community harmonisation is inappropriate and ineffective

51. The Netherlands' second argument is based on the fact that recital 9 in the preamble refers to uncertainty deriving from international patent and plant variety conventions as a justification for harmonisation. The Netherlands submits that it is not for the European Union to undertake such harmonisation. It would have been preferable on several grounds to harmonise by amending the European Patent Convention, which would have effected more extensive harmonisation since States other than the Member States of the European Union are Contracting Parties. As it is, that convention now incorporates the Directive (by way of implementing regulations made by the Administrative Council of the European Patent Office), which is thus imposed on those Contracting Parties who are not Member States. Such a procedure has no place in the external relations of the Union with other European States.

52. That argument is to my mind misconceived, although as the Council suggests it appears implicitly to recognise that harmonisation in the area is necessary. In the context of the internal market, however, it is evident that Community legislation alone can guarantee harmonisation and uniform interpretation. Harmonisation at Community level not infrequently takes place against a background of international conventions the parties to which include both the Member States of the Union and third countries: in the area of intellectual property, for example, the Trade Marks Directive has some overlap with earlier agreements such as the Paris Convention for the protection of industrial property and the Madrid Agreement concerning the international registration of marks. The existence of that context does not however deprive the Community institutions of the competence in the area conferred upon them by the Treaty.

53. Moreover I agree with the Parliament that in any event amendment of the Convention, even if feasible given the cumbersome procedure and the involvement of third countries, would not guarantee harmonisation for two reasons in particular. First, in proceedings at national level to annul a European patent divergences of interpretation would develop, in contrast to the position under the Directive where national courts can refer questions of interpretation to the Court of Justice. Second, the Convention does not concern the extent of protection conferred by a patent, which is essential with regard to biotechnology and which is governed by national law. Furthermore those points themselves provide further support for the view that the Convention not merely would not guarantee harmonisation but is simply irrelevant for this aspect of the Directive, since important areas of patent law governed by the Directive are outside its scope.

54. As for the fact - criticised by the Netherlands - that the European Patent Convention now incorporates certain provisions of the Directive by means of a decision of the Administrative Council amending the Implementing Regulations, which are thus imposed on those contracting parties who are not Member States, it is not for the Court to rule on the manner in which the European Patent Office has chosen to reflect the Directive in its law and practice. It may however be thought that that choice suggests that the Patent Office, which has considerable experience in handling applications for patents for biotechnological inventions, does not anticipate major problems in the interpretation or application of the provisions of the Directive concerning the grant of such patents.

55. Italy adds that the fact that the Directive leaves scope for non-harmonised national rules regulating in particular public health, safety and environmental protection militates against the Directive's contributing to the free movement of the products concerned. That argument is in my view similarly based on a misconception of the function of patent law. As has been discussed above, a patent is a right merely to prevent others from infringing the patent and does not confer any absolute entitlement on the proprietor to exploit the patent: exploitation is always subject to national regulation. Many of the Court's rulings to the effect that an exercise of national patent rights which restricts the free movement of goods is contrary to Article 28 EC and hence unlawful concern patented pharmaceutical products: the fact that the marketing and use of such products is rigorously regulated in all Member States at the national level does not diminish the importance of the principle of the free movement of goods in limiting the exercise of national patent rights. Nor indeed does it mean that Community legislation for the harmonisation of national laws relating to supplementary protection certificates, which confer protection akin to patent protection, is misconceived, ineffective or unlawful.

56. I accordingly do not accept the argument that Community harmonisation is inappropriate and ineffective.

The argument that Articles 130 and 130f, together with Article 235, were the correct legal basis

57. Italy submits first that the aims of the Directive go beyond harmonisation, including objectives linked to support for industrial development in the Community and for scientific research in the genetic engineering sector. In support of that argument it refers to recitals one to three in the preamble to the Directive. Other provisions of the Treaty (Articles 130 and 130f (now Articles 157 and 163 EC)) are appropriate for legislation in the sectors of industry and research respectively, in conjunction with Article 235. The functioning of the internal market is a secondary objective of the Directive, which should therefore not have been based on Article 100a.

58. The Court has made it clear that the choice of the legal basis for a measure must be based on objective factors which are amenable to judicial review, including in particular the aim and content of the measure as they appear from its actual wording. Where moreover a measure pursues more than one objective, its principal objective is decisive for determining the correct legal basis.

59. The first three recitals in the preamble to the Directive do indeed refer to the importance of the protection of biotechnological inventions for the Community's industrial development, research and development in the field of genetic engineering and investment in the field of biotechnology. Recitals 5 to 7 however stress the need for the elimination of differences in national law on the protection of biotechnological inventions which could create barriers to trade and hence impede the proper functioning of the internal market. Recital 7 in particular states that disincentives to trade flowing from the uncoordinated development of national law would be to the detriment of the industrial development of such inventions and of the smooth operation of the internal market, thus linking the two aims. Recitals 8 and 9 make further reference to the harmonising aim of the Directive.

60. More fundamentally, it appears that, although the laws of all Member States concerning the conditions for the grant of a patent and the exceptions to patentability broadly reflect the European Patent Convention and are thus to some extent already aligned, there are none the less significant differences in some areas of national law and practice. It appears for example that some Member States already grant patents for biotechnological inventions involving animals: in France, for example, a patent was granted in 1991 for a process for producing a transgenic mouse and in Italy the first patent concerning a transgenic mammal was granted in 1996. The Parliament gives other examples of divergences in national law and practice the existence of which is not disputed by the Netherlands.

61. That harmonisation is the principal aim of the Directive is moreover borne out by its content: indeed Article 1(1) unequivocally requires Member States to adjust their national patent law to take account of its provisions. The extent to which the provisions of the Directive will affect industrial development in the Community and scientific research in the genetic engineering sector is more difficult to assess. What seems clear however is that the impact of the Directive on those areas is indissociably linked with its harmonising effect.

62. Although Articles 130 and 130f confer powers on the Community to undertake specific action in the fields they cover, they do not confer any legislative power and they leave intact the powers held by the Community under other provisions of the Treaty, even if the measures to be taken under the latter provisions pursue at the same time any of the objectives falling within Articles 130 and 130f.

63. In the present case, I consider that harmonisation is not an incidental or ancillary aim or effect of the Directive but is its essence and that Article 100a was accordingly the correct legal basis. Article 235 could not therefore have been used as the legal basis of the Directive, whether alone or in conjunction with other provisions, since it applies only where the Treaty has not elsewhere provided the necessary powers to legislate.

The argument that the Directive infringes Article 100a(3)

64. Italy refers also to Article 100a(3) of the Treaty, which requires the Commission to take as a base a high level of protection in its proposals based on Article 100a concerning health, safety, environmental protection and consumer protection. Italy submits that Article 100a cannot be the legal basis for a harmonising measure in a field involving fundamental interests such as health and the environment unless the contents of the proposal conform to Article 100a(3). It is clear from recital 14 in the preamble to the Directive that the Community legislature recognised the impact on health and the environment of the exploitation of biotechnological inventions but did not regulate those matters on the basis that it was for Member States to do so. The conditions for Article 100a are accordingly not met.

65. In my view the Directive does not fall within the scope of Article 100a(3). That paragraph applies to proposals... concerning health, safety, environmental protection and consumer protection. A proposal for a directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions is not covered by that paragraph. While it is indisputable that both the conduct of research culminating in biotechnological inventions and the use to which such inventions are put may have significant implications for health, safety and environmental protection in particular, the proposed measure did not seek to regulate such research or use from the standpoint of health, safety or environmental or consumer protection

(in contrast to, for example, the Community legislation on the release into the environment of genetically modified organisms): indeed recital 14 expressly states that substantive patent law cannot serve to replace or render superfluous national, European or international law which may impose restrictions or prohibitions or which concerns the monitoring of research and of the use or commercialisation of its results, notably from the point of view of the requirements of public health, safety, environmental protection....

The argument that the Directive creates a new intellectual property right

66. The Netherlands submits that the Directive creates a specific right so that it cannot be said simply to harmonise national principles of patent law. The Directive requires Member States to protect biotechnological inventions under national patent law. A patent for biotechnological inventions is a patent on life. Biological matter, in particular living animals or plants, cannot be compared to dead matter which until a few years ago could alone be patented. The fact that biological matter can reproduce without human intervention means that protecting it by way of patents is different in kind from so protecting dead matter.

67. It seems to me, however, as submitted by the Parliament, that the patentability of living material is not an innovation introduced by the Directive but the recognition of what is actually happening in conformity with national law: the Member States have long recognised the patentability of certain inventions concerning a living material.

68. The Parliament refers to patents granted for yeast in Belgium and Finland in 1833 and 1843 respectively. More recently, in Germany the Bundesgerichtshof held in 1975 that new micro-organisms per se were susceptible to patent protection and in 1993 acknowledged the patentability of plants. Patents for biotechnological inventions involving transgenic animals have, as already mentioned, been granted in France and Italy in 1991 and 1996 respectively. Numerous European patents for biotechnological inventions have been granted since the early 1980s and recognised in the Member States to which they extend.

69. Moreover the Budapest Treaty on the international recognition of the deposit of micro-organisms for the purposes of patent procedure, which was signed in 1977 and which came into force in 1980, sought to address the problem of providing, with regard to applications for patents for living organisms such as yeasts and other self-replicating organisms, a written description in sufficient detail to satisfy the requirement in most patent law systems for sufficiency of disclosure. That Treaty permitted a specification in a patent application to be supplemented by the deposit of a sample of the organism at an authorised depositary. Applications for such patents have thus for more than 20 years been recognised and regulated at international level.

70. The notion of a patent on life furthermore appears to me to be unhelpful and unclear. As discussed above, a patent does not give rights of ownership or unfettered rights to exploit. It merely entitles the patent-holder to prevent others manufacturing, using or selling the invention without his consent. The patent-holder however is not absolved from compliance with national regulatory requirements in areas such as public health, safety, animal welfare and compliance with ethical standards. The Directive explicitly recognises this in recital 14. The Directive also explicitly recognises numerous limits to patentability in line with national laws and international conventions, as will be discussed in some detail in the context of the third ground for annulment.

71. The Netherlands adds that in addition to creating a new right consisting of a patent over the living products of biotechnological processes, the Directive also creates a new right, so-called farmers' privilege. That privilege, namely the right of a farmer to use for agricultural purposes products protected by patents, is well known in the field of plant protection but not in patent law.

72. The farmers' privilege enshrined in Article 11 of the Directive has two aspects.

73. First, Article 11(1) permits a farmer to use the seed saved from a crop he has grown from patented seed sold to him for agricultural use in order to grow another crop. That derogation is similar in kind to that in Article 14(1) of Council Regulation No 2100/94 on Community plant variety rights (in turn based on provisions of the UPOV Convention 1961 and 1991), although it is more extensive since Article 14(1) of the Regulation is limited to specified plant species of fodder plants, cereals, potatoes and oil and fibre plants. The extent and conditions of the derogation are to correspond to those under Article 14 of the Regulation, which provides in particular that farmers other than small farmers are to pay an equitable remuneration to the holder.

74. Second, Article 11(2) provides an analogous privilege for breeding livestock. In other words, a farmer may use for an agricultural purpose (but not for commercial reproduction) patented breeding stock or other animal reproductive material which he has bought. According to the explanatory memorandum in the Commission's proposal for the Directive, the derogation authorises farmers to use the protected livestock for breeding purposes on their own farms, in order to replenish their numbers. Article 11(3) provides that the extent and the conditions of the derogation are to be determined at national level.

75. In my view it is clear that Article 11 does not create a new right since it is solely concerned with limiting the scope of protection conferred by a patent granted pursuant to the Directive. For further discussion of the protection from which Article 11 derogates, and the rationale for that protection, see the discussion of Articles 8 and 9 in paragraph 121 et seq. below.

76. I accordingly conclude that the argument that the Directive was incorrectly based on Article 100a and should therefore be annulled must be rejected.

The argument as to subsidiarity

77. Article 3b of the EC Treaty (now Article 5 EC) provides:

The Community shall act within the limits of the powers conferred upon it by this Treaty and of the objectives assigned to it therein.

In areas which do not fall within its exclusive competence, the Community shall take action, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States and can therefore, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved by the Community.

Any action by the Community shall not go beyond what is necessary to achieve the objectives of this Treaty.

78. Article 190 of the EC Treaty (now Article 253 EC) provides:

Regulations, directives and decisions adopted jointly by the European Parliament and the Council... shall state the reasons on which they are based and shall refer to any proposals or opinions which were required to be obtained pursuant to this Treaty.

79. The Netherlands' principal submission is that the Directive infringes the second paragraph of Article 3b. It refers to the points it made in the context of the first head (legal basis), which in its view refute any argument that the objectives of the Directive could not be sufficiently achieved by the Member States or that those objectives could be better achieved by the Community by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action. The recitals in the preamble simply state that the legal protection of biotechnological inventions requires clarification (recitals 4 and 9) and that differences exist in the laws and practices of the Member States which could create barriers to trade and hence impede the proper functioning of the internal market (recitals 5 and

7). Since however national patent law has been almost entirely harmonised by the European Patent Convention, the required clarification should be effected by amending that convention. The Member States are thus perfectly able to achieve that objective.

80. In the alternative, the Netherlands submits that it is not clear from the recitals that the second paragraph of Article 3b was taken into account as required by Article 190 and Germany v Parliament and Council.

81. In my view and for the reasons discussed in the context of the first head of argument (as to legal basis), it can properly be considered that the Directive was necessary in order to harmonise Member States' legislation on the patent protection of biotechnological inventions. Since - again for the reasons discussed above - such harmonisation could be effected only by the Community, and since the Community has exclusive competence in the approximation of national rules concerning the establishment and functioning of the internal market, the case for Community action has been adequately made out and the principle of subsidiarity is accordingly not infringed.

82. That the principle was respected is moreover apparent from, in particular, recitals 3, 5, 6, 7 and 9, which show that the Council and the Parliament considered the inadequacy of action at national level in the field of the legal protection of biotechnological inventions and recognised the necessity of harmonising certain principles. It is clear from the case-law of the Court that in such circumstances it is not necessary for the legislation to make express reference to the principle of subsidiarity.

83. Finally, clarification of the law by way of amendment of the European Patent Convention would, as the defendants point out, be inappropriate, ineffective and possibly not feasible.

84. I accordingly conclude that the Directive does not infringe the principle of subsidiarity. The argument that it should be annulled on that basis must therefore be rejected.

The argument as to legal certainty

85. The Netherlands, supported by Italy and Norway, submits that, notwithstanding the statement in its preamble that harmonisation is necessary to clarify the uncertainty regarding the protection of biotechnological inventions, the Directive does not wholly resolve uncertainties concerning the patentability of biotechnological inventions; moreover it creates further uncertainty since the precise meaning and scope of Articles 4, 6, 8 and 9 are not clear. The Directive accordingly infringes the principle of legal certainty.

86. Before looking more closely at the substance of those arguments, the effect of uncertainty in a Community act such as a directive must be considered. The Netherlands has cited no authority for its apparent view that, if the meaning of one or two provisions of the Directive is not entirely and exhaustively clear, the Directive should be annulled; nor has Italy or Norway. Nor indeed has the Court ever to my knowledge endorsed such a principle

87. Article 249 EC (formerly Article 189 of the EC Treaty) states that a directive is to be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each Member State to which it is addressed, but shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and methods. Directives are thus inherently liable not to deal exhaustively with the detail of matters within their scope. While that does not of course mean that unclear drafting is appropriate, it does suggest that the mere fact that a directive confers some discretion on the Member States is not in itself a ground for invalidating it.

88. Even where a provision of a directive is open to different interpretations, as the Netherlands alleges in the present case, I do not consider that that in itself is grounds for annulment. In recent cases in which the Court has held that a Member State, in incorrectly implementing an imprecisely drafted provision of a directive, gave the provision a meaning which it was reasonably capable of bearing, there has been no suggestion that the directive (or even the provision) should be regarded as invalid merely because it was imprecise and hence open to more than one interpretation. Similarly the Court in formulating the principle that only those provisions of directives which are clear and unambiguous may have direct effect has not to my knowledge suggested that all provisions not so precise and unconditional are thereby invalid.

89. I would on the other hand regard it as at least arguable that a provision in a directive which was wholly devoid of meaning, or manifestly irreconcilable with another provision thereof, may be invalid on that ground, although it does not necessarily follow in my view that the directive as a whole should thereby be annulled.

90. Against that background I will consider whether the provisions of the Directive alleged to infringe the principle of legal certainty are meaningless or contradictory to that extent. The arguments focus principally on the meaning and scope of, first, Article 6 and, second, Articles 8 and 9.

The arguments as to Article 6

The relevant recitals and provisions of the Directive

91. Recitals 36, 38 and 39 in the preamble read as follows:

(36) Whereas the TRIPs Agreement provides for the possibility that members of the World Trade Organisation may exclude from patentability inventions, the prevention within their territory of the commercial exploitation of which is necessary to protect ordre public or morality, including to protect human, animal or plant life or health or to avoid serious prejudice to the environment, provided that such exclusion is not made merely because the exploitation is prohibited by their law;

(38) Whereas the operative part of this Directive should also include an illustrative list of inventions excluded from patentability so as to provide national courts and patent offices with a general guide to interpreting the reference to ordre public and morality; whereas this list obviously cannot presume to be exhaustive; whereas processes, the use of which offend against human dignity, such as processes to produce chimeras from germ cells or [from] totipotent cells of humans and animals, are obviously also excluded from patentability;

(39) Whereas ordre public and morality correspond in particular to ethical and moral principles recognised in a Member State, respect for which is particularly important in the field of biotechnology in view of the potential scope of inventions in this field and their inherent relationship to living matter; whereas such ethical or moral principles supplement the standard legal examinations under patent law regardless of the technical field of the invention.

92. Article 6 of the Directive provides:

(1) Inventions shall be considered unpatentable where their commercial exploitation would be contrary to ordre public or morality; however, exploitation shall not be deemed to be so contrary merely because it is prohibited by law or regulation.

(2) On the basis of paragraph 1, the following, in particular, shall be considered unpatentable:

(a) processes for cloning human beings;

(b) processes for modifying the germ line genetic identity of human beings;

(c) uses of human embryos for industrial or commercial purposes;

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(d) processes for modifying the genetic identity of animals which are likely to cause them suffering without any substantial medical benefit to man or animal, and also animals resulting from such processes.

93. The Netherlands and Italy put forward four arguments to the effect that Article 6 infringes the principle of legal certainty. I propose to deal separately with each of those arguments.

Are ordre public and morality sufficiently clear concepts?

94. First, it is argued that Article 6 gives insufficient guidance and the principles mentioned in the recitals for determining whether there is an infringement of ordre public or morality are general and equivocal. According to recital 39, the patent offices and courts must turn to the ethical and moral principles recognised in a Member State to supplement the standard legal examinations under patent law. It is therefore inevitable that Article 6 will be interpreted and applied divergently.

95. I would note at the outset that the concepts of ordre public and morality have a long and distinguished history as criteria for the lawfulness of the grant or exercise of intellectual property rights. In relation to trade marks, for example, Article 6 quinquies (A)(3) of the Paris Convention, dating from the 1911 Washington revision, provides for an exception to the general prohibition on denying registration or invalidating a trade mark where it is contrary to morality or public order. In relation to patents, Article 6(1) of the Directive is, as indicated above, to essentially similar effect as Article 53(a) of the European Patent Convention, although the Convention also prohibits the patenting of inventions the publication of which would be contrary to ordre public or morality. Article 53 itself reproduces almost verbatim Article 2 of the Strasbourg Convention of 1963, although that provision is optional (The Contracting States shall not be bound to provide for the grant of patents in respect of...). Article 27(2) of the TRIPs Agreement is also in similar terms, although again it is permissive rather than mandatory. Provisions such as Article 6(1) have been described as a well-known feature of patent law.

96. Community intellectual property legislation continues this pattern. The Community Trade Mark Regulation and the Trade Marks Directive both provide for the refusal of registration or invalidity of a mark which is contrary to public policy or to accepted principles of morality (contraire à l'ordre public ou aux bonnes moeurs). The Community Plant Variety Rights Regulation provides that there is an impediment to the designation of a variety denomination where it is liable to give offence in one of the Member States or is contrary to public policy (est susceptible de contrevenir aux bonnes moeurs dans un des Etats membres ou est contraire à l'ordre public). Directive 98/71 on the legal protection of designs provides that a design right shall not subsist in a design which is contrary to public policy or to accepted principles of morality (contraire à l'ordre public ou à la moralité publique). The amended proposal for a European Parliament and Council Directive approximating the legal arrangements for the protection of inventions by utility model provides that utility models shall not be granted in respect of inventions the exploitation of which would be contrary to public policy or morality (contraire à l'ordre public ou aux bonnes moeurs).

97. The concept of ordre public in particular also has wider significance in Community law. It is for example used in the French text of the Treaty, although it is usually rendered public policy in English. Articles 30, 39(3), 46(1) and 58(1)(b) (formerly Articles 36, 48(3), 56(1) and 73d(1)(b)) all refer (as grounds for permitted restrictions of the free movement of goods, the freedom of movement of workers, the freedom of establishment and the free movement of capital respectively) to ordre public (public policy in the English). The Court has recognised that the particular circumstances justifying recourse to the concept of public policy may vary from one country to another and from one period to another and that it is therefore necessary to allow the competent national authorities an area of discretion within the limits imposed by the Treaty.

98. The Community legislature has also resorted to the concept of ordre public in numerous harmonising measures, thus apparently seeing no contradiction in conferring a degree of discretion on national authorities in an area subject to harmonisation.

99. The concept of bonnes moeurs seems not to feature significantly in Community law apart from the measures of Community intellectual property legislation mentioned above. However it appears to be used interchangeably with moralité publique in those measures so can perhaps be regarded as synonymous. Article 30 of the Treaty includes moralité publique (public morality) among the permitted grounds for derogating from the free movement of goods. The Court considered the phrase in Henn and Darby and Conegate. In the former, the Court ruled that it was for each Member State to determine in accordance with its own scale of values and in the form selected by it the requirements of public morality in its territory. The Court confirmed that principle in Conegate, although ruling that on the facts the derogation was not applicable.

100. Thus the statement in recital 39 of the Directive that ordre public and morality correspond in particular to ethical or moral principles recognised in a Member State closely reflects the Court's interpretation and application of those concepts in the context of the Treaty. It cannot therefore in my view be argued that the approach of the Directive infringes the principle of legal certainty.

101. The application by national authorities of the concepts of ordre public and morality, however, will always be subject to review by the Court: Member States do not have an unlimited discretion to determine their scope. The Court has stated that recourse by a national authority to the concept of public policy presupposes, in any event, the existence, in addition to the perturbation of the social order which any infringement of the law involves, of a genuine and sufficiently serious threat to the requirements of public policy affecting one of the fundamental interests of society. That statement clearly demonstrates that the Court's approach is essentially similar to that of the European Patent Office, whose guidelines for substantive examination state that the purpose of the ordre public and morality provision is to exclude from protection inventions likely to induce riot or public disorder, or to lead to criminal or other generally offensive behaviour.... National patent authorities which have been acting in the light of those guidelines since the European Patent Convention came into force in their Member State should accordingly experience no conflict once the Directive is in force.

102. It may be added that the discretion of a Member State to determine the scope of the concept of public morality in accordance with its own scale of values, so defined by the Court more than 20 years ago, should perhaps now be read with some caution. In this area, as in many others, common standards evolve over the years. It may be that the ethical dimension of some of the basic issues within the scope of the Directive is now more appropriately regarded as governed by common standards. That was clearly the view of Technical Board of Appeal 3.3.4 of the European Patent Office in 1995, when it stated in Plant Genetic Systems that the concept of morality is related to the belief that some behaviour is right and acceptable whereas other behaviour is wrong, this belief being founded on the totality of the accepted norms which are deeply rooted in a particular culture. For the purposes of the EPC, the culture in question is the culture inherent in European society and civilisation. The fact that some ethical issues may be more appropriately evaluated in the context of the culture of a particular Member State and others are susceptible to a common standard does not however in my view preclude - either here or elsewhere - a degree of harmonisation.

What is the meaning and purpose of the proviso in Article 6(1)?

103. Second, the Netherlands and Italy submit that the meaning and purpose of the proviso in Article 6(1), which states that exploitation of an invention shall not be deemed to be contrary to ordre public or morality merely because it is prohibited by law or regulation, are not clear. Moreover, the statement in recital 14 that a patent for invention does not authorise the holder to implement that invention is contrary to the fundamental principles of national and international patent law according to which the grant of a patent confers on the holder the exclusive right commercially to exploit the invention; furthermore, if it were correct, it would be unnecessary to exclude the patentability of inventions whose commercial exploitation was contrary to ordre public and morality.

104. The proviso appears in both Article 53(a) of the European Patent Convention and Article 2 of the 1963 Strasbourg Convention. It pre-dates both those instruments, however, being drawn from Article 4 quater of the Paris Convention. That provision, which was added by the 1958 Conference of Revision at Lisbon, states:

The grant of a patent shall not be refused and a patent shall not be invalidated on the ground that the sale of the patented product or a product obtained by means of a patented process is subject to restrictions or limitations resulting from the domestic law.

105. The Bureau international de la propriété intellectuelle (the predecessor of the World Intellectual Property Organisation) has explained in a publication that the reason for that provision is that restrictions or limitations may be temporary in nature so that the patent will acquire value once they have been removed. Moreover the patented invention so restricted may be the basis for further patents which do not fall within the restrictions: there is in that case no reason to deprive the holder of the first patent of licence-fees etc. to which the link between the two inventions might entitle him.

106. It is moreover not correct to assert that it would be purposeless to grant a patent for an invention the exploitation of which is prohibited. As suggested above, the inventor may wish to obtain protection in anticipation of a change in the regulatory structure enabling him to exploit his invention in the future. A good topical example is genetically modified organisms - there is a general moratorium on the use of these in the European Union at the moment, but it will not necessarily be indefinite. Similarly at national level an inventor may anticipate a change of government. Alternatively, an inventor may wish to manufacture an invention in a Member State where the exploitation (but not the manufacture) of the invention is prohibited, with a view to exporting it to States in which its exploitation is not prohibited.

107. Accordingly I do not accept that the proviso in Article 6(1) is either unclear in itself or incompatible with the statement in recital 14. Nor do I accept that that statement is contrary to the general principles of patent law: although it is correct that the grant of a patent confers the exclusive right to exploit the invention, that right is, as discussed above, to be exercised in accordance with the applicable national laws and regulations. The grant of the patent thus in itself confers no absolute, positive right to exploit, but merely the right to prevent others from exploiting the invention in the territory where the patent is recognised.

Does ordre public encompass prejudice to the environment?

108. Third, the Netherlands and Italy refer to recital 36, which notes that the TRIPs Agreement recognises in the context of ordre public and morality the grounds of protection of human, animal or plant life or health and the avoidance of serious prejudice to the environment. That raises the question whether, for the purpose of Article 6(1), serious prejudice to the environment, or the risk thereof, may fall within the concept of ordre public.

109. I have already discussed in general terms the scope of the ordre public exception. Preservation of the environment must be regarded in the present state of Community law as one of the fundamental interests of society. That was recognised by the Court as long ago as 1988 in Commission v Denmark and is now enshrined in Article 2 of the Treaty which includes the promotion of a high level of protection and improvement of the quality of the environment among the Community's tasks. The fundamental interests of society referred to by the Court in Bouchereau must to my mind now be understood as extending to the environment. A genuine and sufficiently serious threat to the environment would thus fall squarely within the concept of ordre public; there is accordingly no incompatibility between recital 36 and Article 6(1).

What is the status of recital 38?

110. Finally, the Netherlands states that, although Article 6(2) lists examples of inventions to be considered unpatentable in accordance with Article 6(1), that list does not include (and the Directive does not otherwise provide for) the important exception to patentability spelt out in the last phrase of recital 38: processes, the use of which offend against human dignity, such as processes to produce chimeras from germ cells or [from] totipotent cells of humans and animals, are obviously also excluded from patentability. The Netherlands thus appears to object to the fact that an exception mentioned in a recital is not reflected in the body of the Directive.

111. It appears to me, however, as indicated by the Parliament, that that exception falls within the exclusion from patentability of processes for modifying the germ line genetic identity of human beings in Article 6(2)(b). A chimera is an organism or recombinant DNA molecule created by joining DNA fragments from two or more different organisms. A germ cell is a cell destined to become a sperm or an egg. A totipotent cell is a cell having unlimited capability. The production of chimeras from germ cells or from totipotent cells of humans and animals will inevitably modify the germ line genetic identity of human beings.

112. Even if that were not so, I cannot see that a legislative measure should be annulled for lack of legal certainty merely because an example of conduct excluded from the scope of that measure appears in its preamble but not in its substantive provisions. It is not moreover an unprecedented legislative technique to give an illustrative, non-exhaustive list of examples of situations where an ordre public exception will apply: see for example Article 9(7) of Directive 98/34 laying down a procedure for the provision of information in the field of technical standards and regulations as amended by Directive 98/48 and Article 3(4)(a)(i) of the Directive on electronic commerce.

The argument as to plant and animal varieties

The relevant recitals and provisions of the Directive

113. Recitals 31 and 32 in the preamble read as follows:

(31) Whereas a plant grouping which is characterised by a particular gene (and not its whole genome) is not covered by the protection of new varieties and is therefore not excluded from patentability even if it comprises new varieties of plants;

(32) Whereas if an invention consists only in genetically modifying a particular plant variety, and if a new plant variety is bred, it will still be excluded from patentability even if the genetic modification is the result not of an essentially biological process but of a biotechnological process.

114. Article 4(1) and (2) provides:

1. The following shall not be patentable:

(a) plant and animal varieties;

(b) essentially biological processes for the production of plants or animals.

2. Inventions which concern plants or animals shall be patentable if the technical feasibility of the invention is not confined to a particular plant or animal variety.

115. Plant variety is defined for the purpose of the Directive by reference to the definition in Article 5 of Regulation No 2100/94.

116. Article 8 provides:

1. The protection conferred by a patent on a biological material possessing specific characteristics as a result of the invention shall extend to any biological material derived from that biological material through propagation or multiplication in an identical or divergent form and possessing those same characteristics.

2. The protection conferred by a patent on a process that enables a biological material to be produced possessing specific characteristics as a result of the invention shall extend to biological material directly obtained through that process and to any other biological material derived from the directly obtained biological material through propagation or multiplication in an identical or divergent form and possessing those same characteristics.

117. Article 9 provides:

The protection conferred by a patent on a product containing or consisting of genetic information shall extend to all material, save as provided in Article 5(1), in which the product is incorporated and in which the genetic information is contained and performs its function.

118. In the second argument as to legal certainty, the Netherlands, Italy and Norway refer to several aspects of the provisions of the Directive concerning plant and animal varieties whose meaning and effect are allegedly unclear. I propose to deal separately with each of those points.

The argument as to Articles 8 and 9

119. First, the Netherlands and Norway submit that it is not clear whether plant varieties are in all circumstances excluded from patentability. Article 4(1)(a) provides that plant and animal varieties are not patentable. However, according to Articles 8 and 9 a patent may be obtained for a biotechnological process and its products, even plants and animals. If that process creates a new variety, the protection conferred by the patent will apparently extend to that variety. Moreover, if such a process leads to a new plant variety covered by a plant variety right there may be a conflict between the holders of the patent and of the plant variety right which cannot be wholly resolved by the system of cross-licences under Article 12.

120. In my view there is no conflict between Article 4(1)(a) on the one hand and Articles 8 and 9 on the other.

121. A patent for a product normally gives the holder the exclusive right to manufacture that product (subject to compliance with applicable laws and regulations). In the case of patented material which is capable of reproducing itself, the value of the patent would clearly be eroded if it did not extend to future generations of such material. For example, if the purchaser of patented seeds were able to use the seeds produced by the crop grown from the purchased seeds, the value of that patent would be much reduced. Article 8(1) accordingly states that in such cases the protection conferred by the original patent extends to future generations of biological material derived through propagation or multiplication. Recital 46 expresses that principle in terms of the patent-holder's entitlement to prohibit the use of patented self-reproducing material in situations analogous to those where it would be permitted to prohibit the use of patented, non-self-reproducing products, that is to say the production of the patented product itself. (With regard to seeds, as discussed above Article 11(1) derogates from that protection in prescribed circumstances and for a fee.)

122. Article 8(2) similarly adapts a well-known principle of traditional patent law to the exigencies of biotechnological inventions. Where the subject-matter of a patent is a process, the protection conferred by the patent extends to the products directly obtained by such a process. That principle has been incorporated in international patent legislation since at least 1958, when Article 5 quater was inserted into the Paris Convention. It finds expression in Article 64(2) of the European Patent Convention, which provides:

If the subject-matter of a European patent is a process, the protection conferred by the patent shall extend to products directly obtained by such process.

123. If the products so obtained are themselves capable of replication, the problem discussed in paragraph 121 will arise. For example, a patented process may result in the production of a micro-organism which can be cloned. If such material could be freely propagated by a purchaser, the value of the process patent would be nullified. Article 8(2) accordingly makes it clear that the protection conferred on biological material directly obtained by a patented process extends to future generations of that material.

124. Article 9 caters for the situation where a patent confers protection on a product containing or consisting of genetic information, such as a particular DNA sequence, or a particular gene. It extends the protection conferred by such a patent to all material, subject to the exception in Article 5(1), in which the product is incorporated and in which the genetic information is contained and performs its function. Thus where the DNA sequence or gene is incorporated into a host micro-organism which may be multiplied, the patent protection enjoyed by it will extend to that micro-organism.

125. The Netherlands and Norway argue that, notwithstanding the exclusion from patentability of plant varieties in Article 4(1)(a), a plant variety may benefit from patent protection by virtue of Articles 8 and 9.

126. That proposition is to my mind based on an incorrect analysis of the position: it fails to distinguish the concept of patentability from the concept of the protection conferred by a patent. Both concepts may of course be relevant to a single situation: thus where, for example, a patented gene which confers resistance to herbicides is incorporated into a plant variety other than by or with the consent of the patent-holder, that use of the gene will infringe the patent. If the original patent for the gene did not protect against such use, it would clearly be of very little value. That does not mean, however, that the plant variety will itself be patentable. An example from the field of traditional technology may help to make this clear. Historically, many countries prohibited the patenting of pharmaceutical products. If an unpatentable pharmaceutical product were manufactured which incorporated a specific chemical compound which had been patented, clearly that patent would be infringed by the manufacture of the pharmaceutical product, notwithstanding that the latter product could not itself benefit from patent protection.

127. Articles 8 and 9 thus do not mean that plant varieties will be patentable per se. A direct conflict between the holder of a patent for a given plant variety and the holder of a plant variety right for that variety cannot therefore arise. What may frequently happen however is that a plant breeder will wish to purchase or use a plant variety right in circumstances where that purchase or use will infringe an existing patent, for example on a gene incorporated into that plant variety. Article 12 of the Directive provides for a system of compulsory cross-licences on reasonable terms where in such circumstances the holder of the plant variety right has applied unsuccessfully to the patent-holder for a licence and where the plant variety constitutes significant technical progress of considerable economic interest compared with the invention claimed in the patent.

128. There is thus no conflict between Article 4(1)(a) on the one hand and Articles 8 and 9 on the other.

The argument that animal varieties is not defined

129. The Netherlands objects that the Directive nowhere defines the term animal varieties, used in Article 4(1)(a). The term plant varieties, also used in that article, is by contrast defined in Article 2(3). The scope of the exception for animals is accordingly unclear.

130. The exclusions from patentability in Article 4(1)(a) of the Directive echo those in Article 53(b) of the European Patent Convention which are in turn based on Article 2(b) of the Strasbourg Convention. That context does not in this case help with the interpretation of the terms used; one must turn therefore to the terms themselves.

131. Admittedly, there is no generally recognised taxonomic definition for variety as there is for species or genus, although it may be noted that the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary gives as the biological definition of variety:

A taxonomical grouping ranking next below a sub-species (where present) or species, whose members differ from others of the same species or sub-species in minor but permanent or heritable characters: the organisms which compose such a grouping.

All the other language versions of the Directive use a word meaning breed, which is consistent with the above definition. Understood in that way, the concept of animal variety is in my view not ambiguous.

The arguments as to recitals 31 and 32 and Article 4(1)(a) and 4(2)

132. The Netherlands, supported by Norway, puts forward two arguments to the effect that the above provisions are contradictory and hence infringe the principle of legal certainty.

133. First, recital 31 states that a plant grouping which is characterised by a particular gene is not covered by the protection of new varieties and is therefore not excluded from patentability even if it comprises new varieties of plants. In the text of the Directive however exclusion from patentability is not linked to the possibility of obtaining a plant variety right. Moreover recital 32 states that an invention which genetically modifies a plant variety and by which a new plant variety is obtained will still be excluded from patentability, which contradicts recital 31. However, recital 32 is not logical, since the appearance of a new plant variety must be irrelevant from the point of view of patentability: no patent may be obtained for a plant variety as such.

134. Second, Article 4 is also illogical: Article 4(1)(a) excludes from patentability plant and animal varieties in the plural while under Article 4(2) only inventions concerning one single variety are unpatentable. It is unthinkable in scientific terms that an invention should be technically applicable to one plant or animal variety alone: any invention linked to a genetic modification of a plant or animal will be applicable to several varieties. Article 4(2) is thus meaningless.

135. As a preliminary point, it is useful to mention the reasons underlying the exclusion of plant and animal varieties from patentability in the Directive, which is in the same terms as exclusions in the European Patent Convention and the Strasbourg Convention (although in the Strasbourg Convention the exclusion is expressed as an option).

136. In 1961, and hence even before the Strasbourg Convention was signed, the majority of the States which would subsequently sign the two later conventions signed the UPOV Convention. The UPOV Convention in its original version provided that members could confer either special plant variety protection or patent protection (in either case under national law) on plant varieties within the scope of the Convention, but not both types of protection. Article 2(b) of the Strasbourg Convention and Article 53(b) of the later European Patent Convention exclude patent protection for plant varieties in recognition of this internationally accepted approach.

137. It is helpful to bear in mind that, at the time the Directive was being drafted and going through the legislative process, the scope of the exception for plant varieties in Article 53(b) was unclear.

138. In February 1995 Technical Board of Appeal 3.3.4 of the European Patent Office had delivered a decision widely interpreted as holding - contrary to earlier case-law - that a claim embracing plant varieties within its subject-matter was not allowable. In November 1995 the Enlarged Board of Appeal stated that, correctly interpreted, that decision had held that plants grown from cells into which a gene sequence conferring resistance to herbicides had been inserted were as a result of that genetic modification a plant variety within the meaning of Article 53(b).

139. Clearly that ruling, the effect of which was that any genetically modified plant was regarded as a plant variety and hence unpatentable, would have seriously undermined one of the principal objectives of the Directive. The Council and the Parliament have confirmed in their written observations to the Court that that case-law of the European Patent Office explains the wording of the relevant provisions of the Directive, which were drafted so as to ensure that they did not lead to the same result. Recital 31 states that a plant grouping characterised by a particular gene is not covered by the protection of new varieties even if it comprises new varieties. That situation however must be distinguished from an invention which consists only in genetically modifying a particular plant variety which itself results in a new variety: in such a case, recital 32 states that the exception to patentability will apply. Article 4(2) in effect reverses the decision in Plant Genetic Systems: an invention - such as the genetic modification of a plant so as to increase its resistance to a herbicide - may be patented if its technical feasibility is not confined to a particular variety, or to put it another way, it will not be excluded from patentability solely because the claim encompasses plant groupings which embrace more than one variety.

140. It may be noted that the above interpretation of recitals 31 and 32 and Article 4(2) is in accordance with the current case-law of the European Patent Office following the decision in December 1999 of the Enlarged Board of Appeal in the Novartis case.

141. I accordingly conclude that all the arguments to the effect that the Directive should be annulled on the ground that it infringes the principle of legal certainty should be rejected.

The argument as to the infringement of international obligations

142. The Netherlands submits that, in adopting the Directive, the Parliament and Council infringed Article 228(7) of the EC Treaty (now Article 300(7) EC) since the Directive is incompatible with various international obligations.

143. Article 228 is concerned with agreements concluded between the Community and one or more States or international organisations. Article 228(7) provides:

Agreements concluded under the conditions set out in this Article shall be binding on the institutions of the Community and on Member States.

144. The international obligations invoked by the Netherlands arise under the TRIPs Agreement, the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, the European Patent Convention and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

145. The Council submits as a preliminary point that the question whether a Community act is unlawful because it infringes provisions of an international agreement to which the Community is a party arises only if those provisions have direct effect. The Council considers that the provisions of the TRIPs Agreement, the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade and the Convention on Biological Diversity by their nature do not have direct effect. Their alleged infringement cannot therefore be invoked as a ground for reviewing the legality of the Directive.

146. I do not however consider that, on the assumption that the provisions of the international agreements referred to do not have direct effect, that necessarily supports the conclusion which the Council draws. In Germany v Council, relied on by the Council as authority for its submission, the Court stated that it could review the lawfulness of a Community act from the point of view of international obligations (the GATT rules) which did not have direct effect if the Community intended to implement a particular obligation entered into within the framework of those rules or if the Community act expressly referred to specific provisions thereof. It is that criterion rather than direct effect which seems appropriate in this context.

147. More generally, it might be thought that it is in any event desirable as a matter of policy for the Court to be able to review the legality of Community legislation in the light of treaties binding the Community. There is no other court which is in a position to review Community legislation; thus if this Court is denied competence, Member States may be subject to conflicting obligations with no means of resolving them.

148. I accordingly propose to consider the substance of the Netherlands' arguments concerning the alleged infringement by the Directive of various international obligations of the Member States notwithstanding the Council's submission.

Infringement of the TRIPs Agreement

149. Recitals 12 and 36 in the preamble to the Directive read as follows:

(12) Whereas the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPs)... signed by the European Community and the Member States, has entered into force and provides that patent protection must be guaranteed for products and processes in all areas of technology;

(36) Whereas the TRIPs Agreement provides for the possibility that members of the World Trade Organisation may exclude from patentability inventions, the prevention within their territory of the commercial exploitation of which is necessary to protect ordre public or morality, including to protect human, animal or plant life or health or to avoid serious prejudice to the environment, provided that such exclusion is not made merely because the exploitation is prohibited by their law.

150. Article 1(2) of the Directive provides:

This Directive shall be without prejudice to the obligations of the Member States pursuant to international agreements, and in particular the TRIPs Agreement and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

151. Article 27(3)(b) of the TRIPs Agreement permits members to exclude from patentability:

plants and animals other than micro-organisms, and essentially biological processes for the production of plants or animals other than non-biological and microbiological processes....

152. The Netherlands submits that the Directive prevents Member States from choosing whether to use that option since it provides for a system of patentability which extends to plants and animals other than plant and animal varieties. The Directive is accordingly incompatible with the TRIPs Agreement.

153. It seems to me that that argument can be met without needing to discuss further whether Recitals 12 and 36 and Article 1(2) of the Directive are sufficient to confer competence on the Court to review the legality of the Directive in the light of the TRIPs Agreement.

154. The option in Article 27(3)(b) of the TRIPs Agreement allows WTO Members to exclude a wide range of subject-matter from patentability. The Community, a Member, has chosen, in Article 4(1) of the Directive, to exclude only part of that range from patentability. The Community was thereby exercising the option in accordance with Article 27(3). The fact that that option is no longer available to the Netherlands is a consequence not of any infringement of the TRIPs Agreement but of the harmonising effect of the Directive.

155. Moreover the Netherlands cannot rely on Article 1(2) of the Directive. That provision states that the Directive is to be without prejudice to Member States' obligations pursuant to the TRIPs Agreement. The Netherlands' obligations under that Agreement are however not affected by Article 4(1) of the Directive, which simply exercises a right (of option) and does not affect such obligations.

Incompatibility with the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade

156. The Netherlands submits that the Directive contains technical regulations within the meaning of the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, Article 2 of which regulates the adoption of such regulations. Moreover notice of draft technical regulations must be published and notified to the Secretariat of the World Trade Organisation in accordance with Article 2.9 of the Agreement. The Netherlands is not aware that the prescribed procedure has been followed; in any event, it is not apparent from the Directive itself so that the Court cannot monitor compliance.

157. The Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade aims to ensure that technical regulations and standards, including packaging, marking and labelling requirements, and procedures for assessment of conformity with technical regulations and standards do not create unnecessary obstacles to international trade. Article 1.3 provides that all products, including industrial and agricultural products, are to be subject to the Agreement. The Agreement requires Members to ensure that technical regulations are not prepared, adopted or applied with a view to or with the effect of creating unnecessary obstacles to international trade and imposes certain requirements of publication and notification with regard to technical regulations which may have a significant effect on trade of other Members. Technical regulation is defined as follows:

Document which lays down product characteristics or their related processes and production methods, including the applicable administrative provisions, with which compliance is mandatory. It may also include or deal exclusively with terminology, symbols, packaging, marking or labelling requirements as they apply to a product, process or production method.

158. The Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade is, like the TRIPs Agreement, a WTO Agreement. The Directive makes no reference to it, nor is there any suggestion that the Directive is intended to implement it, within the meaning of the Court's case-law. The Agreement cannot therefore in my view be invoked in proceedings for the annulment of a directive.

159. I cannot in any event see any argument to support the assertion that the Directive is a technical regulation as defined by the Agreement and hence within the scope of the Agreement. It does not lay down product characteristics within the meaning of the Agreement, nor does it create obstacles to international trade. I accordingly consider that the Netherlands' submission on this head should be dismissed.

Incompatibility with the European Patent Convention

160. Article 53(a) of the European Patent Convention provides that a European patent may not be granted in respect of inventions the publication or exploitation of which would be contrary to ordre public or morality, provided that the exploitation shall not be deemed to be so contrary merely because it is prohibited by law or regulation in some or all of the Contracting States.

161. Article 6(1) of the Directive provides that inventions shall be considered unpatentable where their commercial exploitation would be contrary to ordre public or morality; however, exploitation shall not be deemed to be so contrary merely because it is prohibited by law or regulation. Article 6(2) specifies several processes and one use which are in particular to be considered unpatentable.

162. The Netherlands notes that the criterion of unpatentability under the Directive is thus whether the commercial exploitation of an invention is contrary to ordre public or morality. The criterion under the Convention however is whether the publication or exploitation of an invention is contrary to ordre public or morality. Moreover a national patent will have to be refused on the specific grounds mentioned in Article 6(2) of the Directive, whereas the Convention provides a more general ground. An invention which has been considered unpatentable under the Directive may thus none the less be lawful in a Member State as a European patent. The Directive and the Convention are accordingly incompatible, and Article 1(2) of the Directive is thus negated.

163. However, it is clear to me that Article 228(7) of the EC Treaty does not apply to the European Patent Convention since that Convention is not an agreement concluded by the Community. The Community is accordingly not bound by the Convention and the Directive cannot infringe it. The alleged incompatibility between the Convention and the Directive cannot therefore, even if substantiated, be a ground for annulment of the Directive.

164. In any event, any differences between the substantive requirements of the two instruments are to my mind marginal. As demonstrated in the context of the Netherlands' third ground of annulment, and in particular in discussing the scope of the ordre public exception, there is no reason to consider that the concept of ordre public falls to be interpreted differently in the Convention and in the Directive. Any risk that national courts will, when applying national law implementing the Directive, interpret the concept differently from the European Patent Office when applying the Convention is now moreover even further reduced since the entire text of the Directive has (since the present case was lodged) been incorporated in the Implementing Regulations to the Convention, which state that the Directive shall be used as a supplementary means of interpretation.

165. Admittedly there remains the point that the prohibition on patentability in the Convention extends to inventions whose publication would be contrary to ordre public and morality whereas the prohibition in the Directive does not, referring solely to commercial exploitation. That difference however to my mind has no practical impact, since an invention whose publication but not whose commercialisation would be so contrary seems scarcely conceivable.

166. I accordingly consider that the Netherlands' submission on this head should be dismissed.

Incompatibility with the Convention on Biological Diversity

167. Recitals 55 and 56 in the preamble to the Directive state:

(55) Whereas following Decision 93/626/EEC the Community is party to the Convention on Biological Diversity of 5 June 1992; whereas, in this regard, Member States must give particular weight to Article 3 and Article 8(j), the second sentence of Article 16(2) and Article 16(5) of the Convention when bringing into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive;

(56) Whereas the Third Conference of the Parties to the Biodiversity Convention, which took place in November 1996, noted in Decision III/17 that "further work is required to help develop a common appreciation of the relationship between intellectual property rights and the relevant provisions of the TRIPs Agreement and the Convention on Biological Diversity, in particular on issues relating to technology transfer and conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising out of the use of genetic resources, including the protection of knowledge, innovations and practices of indigenous and local communities embodying traditional lifestyles relevant for the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity".

168. Article 1(2) of the Directive provides:

This Directive shall be without prejudice to the obligations of the Member States pursuant to international agreements, and in particular the TRIPs Agreement and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

169. The Convention on Biological Diversity, signed by the Community and all the Member States on 5 June 1992 and approved by the Community on 25 October 1993, seeks to ensure the sustainable conservation and use of biological diversity. An important aspect is the fair and equitable sharing of the benefits arising out of the utilisation of genetic resources, including by appropriate access to genetic resources and by appropriate transfer of relevant technologies, taking into account all rights over those resources and to technologies. Norway, as a member of the European Economic Area, is also a party to the Convention.

170. Genetic resources are defined as genetic material of actual or potential value. Genetic material is defined as any material of plant, animal, microbial or other origin containing functional units of heredity. Technology includes biotechnology.

171. Article 3 of the Convention provides:

States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies, and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

172. Article 8 of the Convention lays down certain measures to be taken to encourage biological diversity in natural habitats. Paragraph (j) requires the Contracting Parties to respect, preserve and maintain knowledge, innovations and practices of indigenous and local communities embodying traditional lifestyles relevant for the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity.

173. Article 16(2) of the Convention requires the provision and/or facilitation of access to and transfer of technology, including biotechnology, to developing countries under fair and most favourable terms. The second sentence of Article 16(2) states that, in the case of biotechnology subject to patents, such access and transfer are to be provided on terms which recognise and are consistent with the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights. Article 16(5) states that patents may have an influence on implementation of the Convention and requires the Contracting Parties to ensure that such rights are supportive of and do not run counter to its objectives.

174. The Netherlands submits that the relationship between the patentability of biotechnological inventions and the obligations flowing from the Convention on Biological Diversity is unclear. In particular it is not clear to what extent the grant of a patent for a biotechnological invention obtained from, or consisting of, a biological material which is to be found exclusively in developing countries or developed by traditional methods is compatible with the obligation equitably to share the knowledge and benefits of genetic resources. Where a patent has been granted, the rights of the holder cover not only the protected biotechnological invention or material but also the products of that material. Farmers in developing countries will therefore be able to profit from that invention only after payment of dues to the patent-holder. Implementation of the Directive may accordingly involve infringing the Convention.

175. Moreover, although the Directive draws a clear distinction between inventions, which are patentable, and discoveries, which are not, there is a risk that traditional products and processes originating in developing countries may be mistakenly granted a patent even though they are discoveries rather than inventions: it is in practice difficult to determine whether living material is a discovery or an invention, precisely because not all traditional products and processes are known. In that case, the income from such patents would benefit not the developing country concerned but the (Western) patent-holder. The developing country would have to launch lengthy and costly legal proceedings to challenge a patent once granted, which would conflict with the requirement in the Convention that knowledge and the benefit of genetic resources in the developing countries should be justly shared.

176. Norway submits that several aspects of the Directive are incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention. Implementation of the Directive may thus force States to disregard provisions of the Convention. Moreover adoption of the Directive in the EEA Joint Committee will create serious problems for Norway, which will be subject to conflicting Treaty obligations. The Directive should accordingly be annulled.

177. In my view, the arguments that the Directive is incompatible with the Convention on Biological Diversity betray a failure to appreciate the respective objectives and spheres of application of the two instruments.

178. The Directive, as is clear from the analysis in the context of the earlier grounds for annulment, requires the Member States of the European Union to ensure that their national law provides patent protection for biotechnological inventions as there defined. To that effect it imposes a few highly specific obligations on the Member States in that narrow context. Patents conferred in accordance with the Directive will of course, as with all patents, be territorial in effect.

179. The Convention, in contrast, is more in the nature of a framework agreement. Having set out its objectives in Article 1, the Convention proposes a series of approaches which Contracting Parties (which as at 5 June 2001 numbered 180 States worldwide) are to adopt, in many cases only as far as possible and as appropriate. The scope of the Convention is rather wide; the suggested measures are rather varied and in most cases couched in general terms.

180. It is axiomatic that nothing in the Directive could require States which are not Member States of the European Union (or Contracting Parties to the Agreement on the European Economic Area) to confer patent protection on biotechnological inventions (although of course other international instruments, including the TRIPs Agreement, may have precisely that effect). Thus the approach of developing countries - where, as the Netherlands and Norway suggest, much genetic richness is concentrated - to the patent protection of biotechnological inventions remains unaffected by the Directive.

181. The Directive, being concerned with patents, does not seek to regulate matters outside the realm of industrial property. Again as discussed both above and below, it is not for patent legislation to provide for broader matters such as monitoring the source of biological material in respect of which patent protection is sought. The Directive does not - nor can it - affect the ability of developing countries to establish controls over their genetic resources in order to prevent the unregulated plundering of such resources. At least a dozen countries have already taken such steps, in accordance with the Convention on Biological Diversity, and a similar number are currently developing controls.

182. I do not understand how, as the Netherlands submits, traditional products and processes originating in developing countries may be patented in accordance with the Directive even though they are discoveries not inventions. As the Directive makes explicit, in order to be patentable an invention must be new, must involve an inventive step and must be susceptible of industrial application. Those requirements, which have been part of patent legislation in one form or another since the Venetian law of 1474, are not mere formalities, but are the essential conditions of patentability which must each be satisfied before a patent can be granted. Natural resources as such cannot therefore be the object of a patent.

183. In any event, nowhere does the Convention prohibit or restrict the patentability of biotechnological materials, or even of genetic resources; on the contrary, Article 16(2) of the Convention requires that access to and transfer of biotechnology subject to patents shall be provided on terms which recognise and are consistent with the adequate and effective protection of intellectual property rights.

184. I accordingly reject the arguments that the Directive and the Convention on Biological Diversity are incompatible, without therefore needing to consider what the implications of any such incompatibility would be.

The argument as to fundamental rights

185. Article F(2) of the Treaty on European Union states:

The Union shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law.

186. Recitals 16, 20, 21, 26 and 43 in the preamble to the Directive state:

(16) Whereas patent law must be applied so as to respect the fundamental principles safeguarding the dignity and integrity of the person; whereas it is important to assert the principle that the human body, at any stage in its formation or development, including germ cells, and the simple discovery of one of its elements or one of its products, including the sequence or partial sequence of a human gene, cannot be patented; whereas these principles are in line with the criteria of patentability proper to patent law, whereby a mere discovery cannot be patented;

(20) Whereas, therefore, it should be made clear that an invention based on an element isolated from the human body or otherwise produced by means of a technical process, which is susceptible of industrial application, is not excluded from patentability, even where the structure of that element is identical to that of a natural element, given that the rights conferred by the patent do not extend to the human body and its elements in their natural environment;

(21) Whereas such an element isolated from the human body or otherwise produced is not excluded from patentability since it is, for example, the result of technical processes used to identify, purify and classify it and to reproduce it outside the human body, techniques which human beings alone are capable of putting into practice and which nature is incapable of accomplishing by itself;

(26) Whereas if an invention is based on biological material of human origin or if it uses such material, where a patent application is filed, the person from whose body the material is taken must have an opportunity of expressing free and informed consent thereto, in accordance with national law;

...

(43) Whereas pursuant to Article F(2) of the Treaty on European Union, the Union is to respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 and as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, as general principles of Community law.

187. Article 3(1) of the Directive provides:

For the purposes of this Directive, inventions which are new, which involve an inventive step and which are susceptible of industrial application shall be patentable even if they concern a product consisting of or containing biological material or a process by means of which biological material is produced, processed or used.

188. Article 5 provides:

1. The human body, at the various stages of its formation and development, and the simple discovery of one of its elements, including the sequence or partial sequence of a gene, cannot constitute patentable inventions.

2. An element isolated from the human body or otherwise produced by means of a technical process, including the sequence or partial sequence of a gene, may constitute a patentable invention, even if the structure of that element is identical to that of a natural element.

3. The industrial application of a sequence or a partial sequence of a gene must be disclosed in the patent application.

189. The Netherlands, citing X v Commission, submits that any Community act which infringes any fundamental right is unlawful. In its view, the Directive infringes fundamental rights both by commission and by omission.

190. The Netherlands submits first that Article 5(2) of the Directive provides that elements isolated from the human body are patentable. The right to human dignity is recognised by the Court as a fundamental right. The human body is the vehicle for human dignity. Making living human matter an instrument is not acceptable from the point of view of human dignity.

191. The Netherlands submits second that the Directive fails to provide for careful management of human material and for the consent of the persons concerned in two contexts.

192. First, the donor of elements isolated from the human body which are patented must at the very least have some control over the fate of his body, or a part thereof. Only in recital 26 however does the Directive mention the donor's right. Recitals have no binding legal force. The fact that there is nothing in the body of the Directive ensuring that human matter is managed carefully must be considered to be contrary to fundamental rights.

193. Second, there is no provision in the Directive for the protection of the recipient of material which has been processed or obtained by biotechnological means. A patient may thus without knowledge or consent receive such treatment. The Netherlands submits that the obligation to respect private life, medical confidence, the right to physical integrity and the protection of the right to personal information, as recognised in the case-law of the Court, may be grouped together as personal rights. In the context of medical treatment, the right of patients to self-determination is in the same category. The Directive seriously and without justification infringes that right.

194. Italy supports the submissions of the Netherlands, adding that a directive which regulates a matter such as biotechnology whose effect on fundamental rights is unquestionable but which fails to provide the necessary guarantees that its application will protect those rights cannot be valid.

195. Thus the Netherlands considers that the Directive violates fundamental rights in two ways: it contains a provision (Article 5(2)) which is contrary to human dignity and it fails to provide for the respect of donors' right of control over donated matter and of medical patients' right of consent to treatment. It is helpful in my view to deal with these arguments separately.

196. I would note that the arguments presented to the Court on the compatibility of the Directive with fundamental rights focus on the abovementioned specific issues alone. I must therefore restrict my analysis of the alleged incompatibility of the Directive with fundamental rights to those issues.

197. There can be no doubt in my view that the rights invoked by the Netherlands are indeed fundamental rights, respect for which must be ensured in the Community legal order. The right to human dignity is perhaps the most fundamental right of all, and is now expressed in Article 1 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, which states that human dignity is inviolable and must be respected and protected. The right to free and informed consent both of donors of elements of the human body and of recipients of medical treatment can also properly be regarded as fundamental; it is also now reflected in Article 3(2) of the EU Charter which requires in the fields of medicine and biology respect for the free and informed consent of the person concerned, according to procedures laid down by law. It must be accepted that any Community instrument infringing those rights would be unlawful.

198. In my view, however, the Directive does not infringe fundamental rights as alleged by the Netherlands and Italy.

Does Article 5(2) infringe fundamental rights?

199. In the first place, I cannot accept the Netherlands' assertion in absolute terms that a patent for an element isolated from the human body is contrary to human dignity. That submission appears to be based on the premiss that patent protection of such an element amounts to an appropriation of part of the human body concerned. A patent however confers no rights of ownership. Moreover, the Directive provides that neither the human body itself nor the simple discovery of one of its elements may be patented. As a matter of general patent law, which is made explicit in Article 3(1) of the Directive, only inventions which are new, which involve an inventive step and which are susceptible of industrial application are patentable. The discovery of an element of the human body, such as a gene, thus cannot be patented; only when the gene has been isolated from its natural state by, for example, processing through purifying steps that separate it from other molecules naturally associated with it, can it be patented, and then only if its industrial application, for example the production of new drugs, is disclosed in the patent application in accordance with Article 5(3) of the Directive. The patent will therefore not cover the gene as it occurs in the human body, since genes in the body are not in the isolated and purified form which is the subject of the patent.

200. Thus the maxim no patent on life is something of an over-simplification.

201. None the less, circumstances in which the grant of a patent for an element isolated from the human body offends against human dignity may perhaps be imagined; moreover future developments in biotechnology may make feasible products or processes which are unimaginable now but which would similarly offend against human dignity. Such inventions would however unquestionably be unpatentable under the Directive by virtue of the exclusion from patentability in Article 6(1) of inventions whose commercial exploitation would be contrary to morality. The Directive thus provides an essential safeguard against the issue of such a patent. That safeguard is moreover so framed as to accommodate future developments: the generality of the standard ensures that it can be applied to inventions in this fast evolving field the detail of which cannot at present be foreseen. It is no doubt for that reason also that the legislature chose not to lay down in Article 6(2) an exhaustive list of examples of inventions which are to be considered unpatentable by virtue of Article 6(1). A case-by-case evaluation of patent applications in the light of moral consensus is the surest guarantee that the right to human dignity will be respected, and that is the framework established by the Directive.

202. It thus seems to me that Articles 5 and 6 of the Directive draw a careful line between cases where elements of human origin should not be regarded as patentable and those where they can properly be regarded as patentable.

203. The Directive also reflects the conclusions of the Group of Advisers to the European Commission on the ethical implications of biotechnology. In its report on the ethical aspects of patenting inventions involving elements of human origin, the Group of Advisers does not recommend excluding the patentability of such inventions as a matter of principle, but considers that it should be subject to certain ethical principles, with the result that fundamental human rights are respected. Thus it says: Whatever is the nature of the biotechnological invention involving elements of human origin, the Directive must give sufficient guarantee so that refusal to grant a patent on an invention in so far as it infringes the rights of the person and the respect of human dignity should be legally founded. That guarantee is to be found in the exclusion from patentability on the ground of morality in Article 6(1) of the Directive.

204. I do not therefore consider that the Directive infringes human dignity by providing that elements isolated from the human body may be patented.

Does the failure to provide for consent infringe fundamental rights?

205. It is not however sufficient to say that the provisions of the Directive do not in themselves infringe fundamental rights. The complaint of the Netherlands and Italy is also that the Directive fails to contain certain provisions necessary to protect such rights and thereby infringes those rights. In particular it fails to ensure that such rights are respected when patents are initially granted for biotechnological products and processes and when such patented products and processes are subsequently exploited and used.

206. The Netherlands submits first that the Directive should provide for the donor of elements isolated from the human body which are patented to have control over the fate of his body or a part thereof.

207. Recital 26 states that, where a patent application is filed for an invention based on or using biological material of human origin, the donor of that material must have had an opportunity of expressing free and informed consent thereto, in accordance with national law.

208. That recital has its origins in an amendment proposed by the Parliament which would have inserted a new Article 8a(2) in the Directive, requiring inter alia that an applicant for such a patent must provide evidence to the patent authorities that the material has been used and the patent applied for with the voluntary and informed agreement of the person of origin.... That amendment was not accepted.

209. It is not clear from the wording of recital 26 in the various language versions whether the consent must relate to the filing of the patent application or to the taking of the material from the donor. Recital 26 therefore may not go as far as recommended by the Group of Advisers to the Commission, which stated:

The ethical principle of informed and free consent of the person from whom retrievals are performed, must be respected. This principle includes that the information of this person is complete and specific, in particular on the potential patent application on the invention which could be made from the use of this element. An invention based on the use of elements of human origin, having been retrieved without respecting the principle of consent will not fulfil the ethical requirements.

210. It is of course clearly desirable that no element of human origin should be taken from a person without their consent. That principle is expressed at the forefront of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights; it is also enshrined in Chapter II of the Council of Europe Convention on human rights and biomedicine, which provides that an intervention in the health field may only be carried out after the person concerned has given free and informed consent to it.

211. In my view, however, although the requirement of consent to all potential uses of human material may be regarded as fundamental, patent law is not the appropriate framework for the imposition and monitoring of such a requirement. A patent, as discussed above, simply confers the right to prevent others from using or otherwise exploiting the patented invention; how the grantee of the patent uses or exploits that invention is regulated not by patent law but by national law and practice governing the field concerned.

212. Moreover to make evidence of such consent a condition of granting a biotechnological patent - presumably by way of the morality principle - to my mind risks being unworkable. Biotechnological inventions may derive from research on possibly thousands of blood or tissue samples, possibly pooled and almost certainly anonymous at the time of analysis. I do not consider that it is reasonable to expect patent examiners to satisfy themselves that the chain of consent with regard to each sample is unbroken and evidenced. It is rather the responsibility of the medical or research staff taking the samples to ensure that consent is given; that responsibility, together with the form and scope of the consent, will be imposed by national regulations, codes of practice etc outside the patent arena. That approach is not inconsistent with recital 26, which refers to national law. Patentability on the other hand is to be assessed only on the basis of the nature of the product or process itself, or on the ground that any commercial or industrial application would be objectionable.

213. Thus in my view the Directive is not the proper place for rules governing the consent of the donor or of the recipient of elements of human origin. Indeed such questions of consent arise more generally with regard to any use of human substances, such as transplants, organ donation, etc. That supports the view that the issues are not to be resolved by patent law, and in particular by patent law as it applies in this specific sector.

214. The Netherlands also submits that the Directive, by failing to require that a patient must consent to receiving medical treatment involving material which has been processed or obtained by biotechnological means, infringes fundamental rights. That argument is in my view misconceived. The conditions of exploitation or use of patented inventions are, as discussed above, outside the scope of patent legislation, falling to be controlled by other means. That is clearly spelt out by recital 14: it is not for substantive patent law, which merely entitles the holder to prohibit third parties from exploiting his inventions for industrial and commercial purposes, to replace ethical monitoring of research or the commercial use of its results. Similarly, as the Council points out, the Directive contains no provision requiring that the recipient of biotechnologically processed matter must be informed simply because it does not and cannot seek to regulate the use or commercialisation of such matter.

215. I therefore reach the conclusion that the Directive does not, either by what it provides or by what it fails to provide, infringe, in itself, fundamental rights recognised in Community law. The possibility cannot of course be excluded that a particular application of the Directive within a Member State may infringe fundamental rights, although it contains provisions designed to avoid that consequence. But the conclusion is clear in my view that the Directive does not in itself infringe fundamental rights.

The argument that the correct procedure was not followed

216. The Netherlands submits that the Directive was not properly adopted since it is based on an unlawful proposal by the Commission. It accordingly infringes the combined provisions of Articles 100a and 189b(2) of the EC Treaty or, at least, those provisions combined with Article 190 of the EC Treaty.

217. Article 189b(2) (now, after amendment, Article 251(2) EC) provides, with regard to legislation governed by that article, that the Commission is to submit a proposal to the European Parliament and the Council.

218. Article 190 (now Article 253 EC) provides:

Regulations, directives and decisions adopted jointly by the European Parliament and the Council... shall state the reasons on which they are based and shall refer to any proposals or opinions which were required to be obtained pursuant to this Treaty.

219. The Netherlands submits that the Commission's operations are governed by the principle of collegiality. That principle is based on the equal participation of the Commissioners in the adoption of decisions, from which it follows in particular that decisions should be the subject of collective deliberations and that all the members of the college of Commissioners should bear collective responsibility at political level for all decisions adopted. The formal requirements for effective compliance with the principle of collegiality vary according to the nature and legal effects of the acts adopted by that institution. The Commission's proposal, which was indispensable to adoption of the Directive, should have been adopted by the college in its definitive version as presented to the Parliament and Council; its text should also have been made available to all the members of the college in all the official languages when it was adopted by the Commission. Nothing in the Directive suggests that this essential procedural requirement was observed.

220. With regard to the argument as to the principle of collegiality, it appears from its reply that the Netherlands is not alleging that that principle was in fact infringed, but merely that the Commission did not verify compliance therewith, or at least that there is no trace of such verification in the preamble to the Directive.

221. As for the submission that the Commission did not verify compliance with the principle, the Commission states (and the Netherlands does not dispute) that the proposal was adopted by the Commission at its meeting of 13 December 1995; the adoption was hence unquestionably lawful.

222. As for the submission that the preamble to the Directive is silent, I would note that there is nothing in the Treaty provisions invoked by the Netherlands which supports its apparent contention that it must be stated in Community legislation that the principle of collegiality has been respected.

223. With regard to the argument that the proposal should have been made available to all the members of the college in all the official languages when it was adopted by the Commission, it must be borne in mind that a Commission proposal is not a decision taking the form of one of the acts referred to in Article 189 of the EC Treaty and is not therefore required by the Treaty to be adopted in authentic versions in all languages. I accept the Commission's submission that it would be inappropriate, and is not necessary in order to respect the principle of collegiality, to require a proposal to be adopted by the college in all languages.

224. In support of that submission, the Commission refers to Article 6 of Regulation No 1 of the Council determining the languages to be used by the European Economic Community, which states that the institutions of the Community may stipulate in their rules of procedure which of the official and working languages are to be used in specific cases. In implementation of that provision, Article 4 of the Rules of Procedure of the Commission states that The agenda and the necessary working documents shall be circulated to the Members of the Commission within the time-limit and in the working languages prescribed by the Commission in accordance with Article 24, which latter provision requires the Commission to determine rules to give effect to the Rules of Procedure. Those implementing rules provide that the working documents relating to an agenda are to be sent to the Members of the Commission in the languages fixed by the President taking account of the minimum needs of the members. The proposal for the Directive was presented to the Members of the Commission in English, French and German and - as is customary - sent to the other institutions in all the official languages.

225. I would accordingly reject the argument that the Directive was not properly adopted since it was based on an unlawful proposal by the Commission.

Conclusion

226. It follows, for the reasons I have given, that this action must, in my opinion, fail. But the action may not have been fruitless. It is clear, I think, that it was prompted by understandable concerns, reflecting a general awareness that the irresponsible pursuit of biotechnological research may have consequences which are ethically unacceptable. Although some of the grounds of challenge were of a purely technical character, those concerns were central. The action may not have been fruitless in that it may have shown that those concerns can and should be allayed.

227. Thus the Directive is concerned in particular with the patentability of biotechnological inventions and not with their use. Within that framework, there are adequate moral safeguards going in some respects beyond mere application of the existing criteria for patentability. The fact that the ethical criteria for patentability are not exhaustively defined, far from undermining the moral safeguard, enhances it since future developments will continue to be governed by those criteria even if not currently foreseeable. Biotechnological inventions which are contrary to human dignity consequently neither are now nor can in the future be patentable in accordance with the Directive.

228. The action moreover highlights the importance of regulating at national level the use of biotechnological material, precisely because such use, since it falls outside the parameters of patentability, is not - indeed cannot be - regulated by the Directive. In particular, adequate provision must be made for ensuring that the principle of informed consent is respected whenever material is taken from human beings which might be used for scientific or technological purposes.

229. It is not therefore the Directive itself which is objectionable as a result of what it contains or what it omits. It is of course crucial that its implementation be carefully controlled to ensure especially that the moral safeguard is fully transposed and assiduously observed. I am satisfied however that the Community legislative framework itself is not illegal.

230. In the result I am of the opinion that:

(1) The action should be dismissed;

(2) The Kingdom of the Netherlands should be ordered to pay the costs of the European Parliament and of the Council;

(3) The interveners should bear their own costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Jacobs delivered on 23 March 2000.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure to fulfil obligations - Public procurement contracts in the transport sector - Directive 93/38/EEC - Applicability ratione temporis - Rennes urban district light railway project - Contract awarded by negotiated procedure without a prior call for competition.
Case C-337/98.

1. In this case, the Commission alleges a failure by the French authorities to comply with the Community rules governing the use of negotiated procedures for the conclusion of procurement contracts by entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, in a specific instance where a negotiated procedure was followed without a prior call for competition. The main issue is whether those rules applied to the procedure in question; the French Government disputes the Commission's contention that they were in force at the material stage of that procedure. If the rules were applicable, it must be determined whether the conditions were met for a derogation from the obligation to issue a call for competition.

The relevant Community legislation

2. Council Directive 93/38 applies to contracting entities operating, inter alia, public transport networks either in their capacity as public authorities or public undertakings or on the basis of special or exclusive rights granted by a competent authority of a Member State (Article 2(1) and (2)(c)).

3. It provides for three types of procedure whereby such entities may award contracts in the fields covered: open, restricted and negotiated procedures. These are defined in Article 1(7) as follows:

(a) in the case of open procedures, all interested suppliers, contractors or service providers may submit tenders;

(b) in the case of... restricted procedures, only candidates invited by the contracting entity may submit tenders;

(c) in the case of negotiated procedures, the contracting entity consults suppliers, contractors or service providers of its choice and negotiates the terms of the contract with one or more of them.

4. Under Article 4(2): Contracting entities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different suppliers, contractors or service providers.

5. Article 20(1) provides: Contracting entities may choose any of the procedures described in Article 1(7), provided that, subject to paragraph 2, a call for competition has been made in accordance with Article 21 (which indicates the forms to be used in notices of calls for competition and prescribes that they are to be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities).

6. However, under Article 20(2): Contracting entities may use a procedure without prior call for competition in the following cases:

(c) when, for technical or artistic reasons or for reasons connected with protection of exclusive rights, the contract may be executed only by a particular supplier, contractor or service provider;

...

7. In accordance with Article 45, Member States were to adopt the measures necessary to comply with the provisions of Directive 93/38 and to apply them by 1 July 1994.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

8. Article 45 also provided that Directive 90/531 - which contained provisions identical for present purposes to those of Directive 93/38 cited above - should cease to have effect as from the date on which the latter was applied by the Member States. Member States had been required to comply with Directive 90/531 by 1 January 1993. Prior to that directive, procurement procedures in the utilities sectors had not been subject to Community regulation.

The relevant French legislation

9. The rules governing public procurement in France are contained principally in the Code des Marchés Publics (Public Procurement Code, hereinafter also the Code).

10. Article 104(I) of the Code requires negotiated contracts to be preceded by a call for competition. Article 104(II) concerns exceptions for which no call for competition is needed. The text applicable at the material times in the present case provides, in so far as is relevant:

Negotiated contracts may be entered into without a prior call for competition when only one specific contractor or supplier is capable of carrying them out.

This applies in the following cases:

(1) when requirements can be met only by [work or supplies] which necessitate recourse to a patent, a licence or exclusive rights held by a single contractor or supplier;

(2) when requirements can be met only by [work or supplies] which, by reason of technical necessity, substantial preliminary investment, special plant or equipment or know-how, can be contracted out only to a specific contractor or supplier;

11. During the relevant period, France had not transposed Directive 93/38. However, Directive 90/531 appears to have been transposed by Law No 92-1282 of 11 December 1992 and Decree No 93-990 of 3 August 1993. Article 2 of the latter contains an exhaustive list of cases where a procedure may be used without a prior call for competition, and item 4 on that list reproduces the terms of Article 15(2)(c) of Directive 90/531, which were identical, as regards contractors and suppliers, to those of Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38.

Factual background

12. Briefly stated, this case concerns a lengthy process to award a contract for the construction of an urban light railway line. The relevance of the different stages in that process lies essentially in determining whether it comprised a single, uninterrupted award procedure or whether a second procedure was commenced at a relatively late stage of the overall process. That issue is relevant in turn when determining the applicability of the Community rules to one of the initial steps in the procedure leading to the final award.

13. Public transport in the conurbation of Rennes in France is the responsibility of a joint grouping of all the constituent municipalities, the Syndicat intercommunal des transports collectifs de l'agglomération rennaise (Sitcar), which apparently comes under the authority of the District Council for the conurbation (the District Council). Decisions are taken by the District Council or by Sitcar's committee, composed of delegates from the various municipalities. The transport service is actually managed by the semi-public company Semtcar.

14. From 1984 onwards, Sitcar investigated ways of improving the service by creating a reserved-track system, that is to say a tram or light railway network. On 26 October 1989, its committee voted, inter alia, to confirm previous decisions to provide a reserved-track network, to opt for the VAL automatic light railway system, to seek government funding and to authorise consultations with a view to awarding a contract for drawing up preliminary specifications. The report on which that vote was taken stated that the VAL system was produced by the two companies Matra (Matra Transport, now apparently known as Matra Transport International) and Alsthom (GEC Alsthom Transport). The contract for drawing up preliminary specifications was, it was stated at the hearing, later awarded to and performed by Matra.

15. From the minutes of its committee meeting of 19 July 1990 it appears that Sitcar, having previously issued an invitation to tender for civil engineering work and equipment not linked to the system and selected the successful tenderer, agreed on that date that the contrat d'ensemblier (turnkey contract, that is to say a contract for the complete work to the point of readiness for operation) for the system and equipment linked to the system would be awarded to Matra once a guaranteed guide price had been determined.

16. In a report read to the committee at its meeting on 12 July 1991, concerning the contract for civil engineering and equipment not linked to the system, the chairman of Sitcar stated that negotiations with Matra were not yet complete but would lead to the conclusion of a turnkey contract.

17. In response to a request from the Court, the French Government has produced a letter from Matra to Sitcar, dated 9 July 1991 and apparently received on 12 July 1991 (though perhaps too late to be mentioned in the report delivered on that date). That letter appears to accompany a file containing Matra's proposal for the system portion of the work on the first VAL line in Rennes. It confirms a guaranteed price of FRF 987 000 000 or, with certain possible modifications to the programme, of FRF 953 200 000, both excluding tax and at January 1991 prices.

18. On 15 February 1993, the Prefect of Ille-et-Vilaine, the département in which Rennes is situated, issued a declaration of public interest in respect of the first line of the VAL light railway network. That declaration was a precondition for proceeding with the project, in particular for making expropriations.

19. On 30 March 1993, the District Council approved the turnkey contract negotiated by Semtcar with Matra for FRF 966 420 000, excluding tax, at January 1993 prices, and authorised its signature. The contract was for the supply of a complete system, including not only track, control post and train sets, but also security, workshop, power-supply and track equipment, together with spare parts and staff training.

20. However, that stage had not been reached without political opposition. A Comité pour une alternative au VAL had been set up in 1991 and most of the relevant resolutions had been opposed by a minority. In addition, the ecological movement Rennes Verte had applied to the Tribunal Administratif (Administrative Court), Rennes, to have the Prefect's declaration of public interest set aside. On 16 February 1994, that court annulled the declaration on the ground that the preliminary inquiry was incomplete as regards analysis of certain required criteria.

21. As a result, by letter of 30 March 1994, the Minister for Infrastructure, Transport and Tourism informed the Chairman of the District Council that government funding, although still in principle available, could not be provided until the administrative procedure had been recommenced and completed as required by that judgment.

22. On 22 September 1995, the District Council passed two linked resolutions. First, it voted to withdraw its previous resolution of 30 March 1993 approving the contract with Matra and authorising its signature by Semtcar, that resolution not having been implemented even inchoately and having become redundant. The report on the basis of which the vote was taken stated that government authorisation had not been granted within the necessary time, thus affecting the terms of performance of the contract, in particular as regards deadlines.

23. Second, the District Council requested Semtcar to resume detailed negotiation/finalisation

["reprendre la mise au point"] of the contract with Matra within the framework of the provisional budget for the operation and to submit it anew to the District Council for approval.

24. In a letter dated 29 July 1996 to two councillors hostile to the project, who had challenged an alleged refusal to communicate the 1993 turnkey contract for the system portion of the VAL line, the Chairman of the District Council stated, inter alia, that the contract could not be communicated because it had never existed, having been neither signed by the competent authority nor forwarded to the Prefect, and that the withdrawal of the resolution approving it called into question the very existence of the project. The decision embodied in that letter was, however, subsequently set aside by a judgment of the Tribunal Administratif of 16 July 1997, which held, inter alia, that the existence of the contract was attested by the terms of the resolution of 30 March 1993 and it could not be deemed inexistent on the ground that it was neither signed nor notified; it was a completed document, having been the subject of negotiation and having been approved by the District Council.

25. On 4 October 1996, the Prefect issued a new declaration of public interest and government funding consequently became available. As a result, the District Council voted on 22 November 1996 to approve the terms of the draft negotiated contract to be concluded with the company Matra Transport International for the work on the system and equipment linked to the system and authorised Semtcar to sign the contract.

Procedure

26. Following a complaint submitted to it in late 1996 - apparently by councillors hostile to the VAL project - the Commission requested clarification from the French Republic, which replied, essentially, that the contract had been awarded in 1989, before the entry into force of Directives 90/531 or 93/38, and that Matra was the only company able to meet the requirements and had already made substantial investments. The Commission sent the French authorities a letter of formal notice in June 1997. Considering the reply to that letter unsatisfactory, it then sent a reasoned opinion under Article 169 of the EC Treaty (now Article 226 EC) concluding that the provisions of Directive 93/38 had been infringed and requiring the French Government to comply with the opinion within two months. In its reply dated 12 June 1998, the French Government maintained its position.

27. The Commission brought the present action on 14 September 1998. It seeks a declaration that, as a result of the resolution of 22 November 1996 awarding Matra the turnkey contract for the Rennes District light railway project, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Directive 93/38, and in particular Articles 4(2) and 20(2)(c) thereof. The specific infringement to which the Commission refers is a failure to issue a prior call for competition in order to avoid discrimination between undertakings.

Analysis

28. The Commission's case is, essentially, that the procedure in issue was initiated on 22 September 1995, that at that date the conditions for the application of the derogation contained in Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38 were not met and that by failing to issue a call for competition the French authorities thus infringed that directive. The French Government maintains that the procedure was commenced (and indeed concluded) at a much earlier date, and that it is the date of commencement which must be decisive when determining whether the Community rules were applicable. In response to the latter point, the Commission argues that, although the date of commencement may be taken into consideration, an unreasonable length of time must not elapse, as it did here, before the actual award of the contract. The French Government submits in the alternative that, if the Commission's main contention is accepted, the conditions for application of the derogation were in any event met.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

29. In those circumstances, although the main issue to be decided is whether a new procedure was commenced on 22 September 1995, it is helpful to clarify the context first by considering the more general issue of the applicability of newly-introduced Community rules to procedures already under way. I shall then examine the main issue of the date of commencement of the procedure. Finally, I shall consider whether the conditions for application of the derogation may have been met.

Directive 90/531 and Directive 93/38

30. In so far as they are relevant to the present case, the rules contained in Directive 90/531 and in Directive 93/38 are identical; the changes introduced by the latter merely extend them to cover contracts for services, as well as for works and supplies. The Commission, however, seeks a declaration of failure to fulfil obligations in respect of Directive 93/38 alone.

31. Consequently, any finding that the provisions of Directive 90/531 were breached during the period when they were applicable but Directive 93/38 was not applicable would be ultra petita. None the less, I consider it useful to bear both directives in mind when analysing the situation in this case.

Applicability of the directives to a procedure already commenced

32. The general principle is that, in the absence of a clear provision and unless the purpose to be achieved so demands, legislation is not to be interpreted as having a retroactive effect. In this case, neither of the directives contains any such provision - or indeed any transitional provisions - nor is there any reason to conclude that their purpose requires any form of retroactive effect.

33. The Court has also recognised the principle that amending legislation applies, unless otherwise provided, to the future consequences of situations which arose under the previous legislation.

34. Those principles, however, do not directly resolve the question of the immediate application of new rules to a procedure already under way at the date by which they were to be transposed. The measures necessary to comply with the provisions of Directive 90/531 should have been applied from 1 January 1993 and those of Directive 93/38 from 1 July 1994 at the latest.

35. Although in a different legislative context, a similar question of application of new Community rules to procedures already under way has been examined by the Court in several cases involving Directive 85/337 on environmental impact assessments, which also contains no transitional provisions. The Court has held that obligations imposed by that directive must apply to a consent procedure commenced after the deadline for their transposition into national law but before that transposition was actually effected. In order to determine whether the directive rules apply, for reasons of legal certainty the sole criterion must be whether the application for consent was formally lodged before or after the deadline for transposition. The directive was designed to cover projects likely to require a long time to complete, so that complex procedures already initiated under national law and situations already established should not be affected by it.

36. If that reasoning is transposed to the present case, the result is that the rules contained in Directives 90/531 or 93/38 cannot apply to procurement procedures commenced before the dates from which they should have been applied.

37. However, I would not necessarily exclude, as a general rule, the possibility that certain provisions of a directive may be applicable to subsequent stages of procedures already under way at the date of the deadline for their transposition into national law. The Court's approach in the environmental impact assessment cases cited above may have been influenced by the consideration that it could not be determined with certainty at what stage in a procedure the assessment required by the directive should take place, whereas the commencement of the procedure by the lodging of a formal application was a clearly ascertainable event.

38. Such a consideration need not apply where new rules come into effect at an identifiable stage in a sequence of steps making up a complete procedure. What can be excluded, however - in line with the requirement of legal certainty to which the Court has referred - is any application of such rules to stages of a procedure which have already been completed. Indeed, unless such stages were already in compliance with the new rules, the only way in which they could be brought into compliance would be by repeating them, requiring a recommencement of the whole procedure in cases where the initial stages are in issue - and that intention cannot be attributed to the Community legislature in the absence of a clear indication.

39. In either event, whether the rules in the directives can apply to subsequent stages of procedures already under way or not, I conclude that they cannot have any effect on stages completed before the dates on which they were to be applied.

40. In the specific context of a Community procurement directive not transposed within the period prescribed, that conclusion is consistent with the Court's ruling in Tögel, that Community law does not require an awarding authority in a Member State to intervene... in existing legal situations... where those situations came into being before expiry of the period for transposition. Although that ruling concerned a situation in which the contract itself had been concluded before, but for a period extending beyond, that date, the principle is in my view of general application: it applies to whatever and however many stages of a procurement procedure have been completed before expiry of the period for transposition.

Applicability of the directives in the present case

41. It is clear from the evidence before the Court that the stage at which a call for competition might have been issued in the original procedure was completed well before 1 July 1994, when the period for transposition of Directive 93/38 expired, and even before 1 January 1993, by which date the provisions implementing Directive 90/531 were to be brought into force.

42. The issuing of a call for competition must be prior to the commencement of negotiations. Here, it is clear that negotiations had already commenced by 19 July 1990 at the latest - prior to even the adoption of Directive 90/531 - and had been substantially completed by 9 July 1991. Agreement was reached by 30 March 1993. Indeed, at the hearing, the Commission appeared to accept that if the contract had been carried out as approved on the latter date the Community procurement rules would not have been infringed.

43. However, the Commission's case is based on the premiss that the original procedure outlined above came to an end on 22 September 1995 and that a new procedure was then commenced. France, on the other hand, contends that there was no such conclusion and recommencement but a single continuing procedure delayed at one stage by an administrative hitch.

44. The question to be answered is thus: what were the effects of the withdrawal of the resolution approving the 1993 contract and of the decision to resume detailed negotiations with Matra?

45. The contract approved on 30 March 1993 was, it appears, never signed. The Court has been presented with various arguments as to whether a binding award was none the less made at that date or at an earlier stage when agreement was reached on terms. The Commission considers that the award was made on 30 March 1993, there having been no final, unconditional agreement prior to that date. The French Government argues that Matra had acquired a right to the contract by its firm commitment as to price on 9 July 1991.

46. We have also heard conflicting views on whether, assuming there was such an award, the contract was rendered void by the withdrawal of the resolution approving it. The Commission argues that the withdrawal meant, in French administrative law, that the resolution was deemed never to have existed. The French Government asserts that the position was simply that, until a new declaration of public interest was issued and the funding conditional thereupon released, it was impossible to sign the contract with Matra; a binding decision to award the contract to that company had none the less been taken and remained in existence unless and until a competent court should decide otherwise.

47. As for the significance of the resolution requesting Semtcar to reprendre la mise au point of the contract, the Commission sees it as clear evidence of the commencement of a new procedure, the French Government as a resumption and continuation of the original procedure. The contract approved on 22 November 1996 is invoked by both parties in support of their positions: the Commission claims it diverges in substantial respects from the 1993 contract, whereas the French Government asserts that it was substantially the same, the only differences being the choice of a marginally different model as a result of technical developments in the intervening period and an updating of the price.

48. The Commission's action is brought in respect of the procedure leading to the award of the contract approved for signature on 22 November 1996. What is at issue is whether that award was the outcome of the original procedure or whether the latter had come to a close on or before 22 September 1995.

49. Directive 93/38 lays down certain requirements to be observed before, during and following the award stage of a procedure but does not specify how it is to be determined when that award has taken place. This is understandable. The Community procurement directives do not effect a complete harmonisation of procedures but lay down requirements to be observed where specified criteria are met, in particular as regards the value of the contract. All other applicable rules, including those which determine the stage at which a contract is awarded or concluded, takes effect or becomes binding, will be found in national law. Since the Court is not competent to rule on matters of French law, a number of hypotheses will have to be considered.

50. When considering those hypotheses, however, it must be borne in mind that in proceedings against a Member State for a declaration of failure to fulfil an obligation, it is incumbent on the Commission to prove that the obligation has not been fulfilled and to place before the Court the information necessary to enable it to determine whether that is so.

51. Three possibilities may be envisaged when considering when the original procedure was brought to an end: it may have been concluded by the approval of the contract by the District Council on 30 March 1993, by an award at some earlier stage, perhaps when firm agreement had been reached, or by some later event.

52. If approval by an elected body is necessary and a procedure is concluded by the decision approving the contract and authorising its signature, then the resolution of 30 March 1993 would appear to have brought the original procedure to an end. However, on the Commission's own argument, the withdrawal of that resolution means that it is deemed never to have existed. Thus, it seems inevitable, the original procedure must be deemed not to have been terminated. In those circumstances, the negotiations in 1995 and 1996 could qualify as a continuation of that procedure.

53. If a procedure is concluded by a separate award and that award is made when, say, firm agreement is reached between the contracting entity and the future contractor, so that approval by the elected body, whilst essential for other reasons, does not affect the existence of that award, then it would seem to follow that withdrawal of that approval can likewise not affect the existence of the award, although presumably there must be some new approval before the contract can take effect. In those circumstances the award, if made before 30 March 1993, would have remained in existence after 22 September 1995, since the only measure withdrawn on that date was the resolution approving the contract and authorising its signature, and could have been subsequently approved anew by the resolution of 22 November 1996.

54. If the original procedure was not concluded either on or before 30 March 1993, then it must have been concluded by some later event. The withdrawal of the resolution of 30 March 1993 could not, in that hypothesis, have been that event. If the procedure were to have been terminated by the withdrawal of a decision, it would have had to be one actually constituting the procedure - such as the decision to carry out the project, to seek a supplier for a light railway system or to negotiate with Matra. No such decision was withdrawn. In that case, the contract approved on 22 November 1996 would appear to be the outcome of the original procedure, to the initial stages of which the Community rules could not apply.

55. However, the conclusions I have set out in those three hypotheses are all dependent on a further element: it must be established whether the negotiations conducted in 1995 and 1996 were in fact a continuation of those which took place prior to 1993 and/or concerned merely a permissible refinement of the agreement reached at the earlier stage or whether, on the contrary, they represented a new departure.

56. In that regard, the language used in the second resolution of 22 September 1995 - "reprendre la mise au point" - is highly indicative of both a resumption and a refinement of negotiations. Moreover, the French Government has produced a letter from Matra to Semtcar dated 30 November 1995, stating that Matra had examined the impact of readjusting the timetable for the project and, taking account of an agreed updating of the administrative specifications, confirmed that its tender negotiated in early 1993 would be maintained until 30 September 1996. Those two documents are strong evidence, not refuted by the Commission, that negotiations were in fact resumed shortly after 22 September 1995 on the basis of everything that had gone before. In that context, the contracting entity could hardly be expected to remain irrevocably burdened with an outdated model as a result of forced delays, whatever their cause, and both the change of model and the updating of the price seem wholly legitimate adjustments. The Commission having provided no evidence of any greater substantial difference between the two, I consider that the contract approved on 22 November 1996 may legitimately be regarded as the outcome of a continuation of the earlier negotiations and/or a permissible refinement of the agreement reached at the earlier stage.

57. I thus reach the view that it has not been established that the original procedure was concluded at an earlier stage in any of the three possible hypotheses, so that the contract approved on 22 November 1996 may be regarded as the conclusion of that procedure, at the commencement of which Community procurement rules did not apply to contracts awarded by entities operating public transport networks. Consequently, the fact that no prior call for competition was issued cannot constitute an infringement of those rules.

The derogation in Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38

58. I shall nevertheless consider in the alternative the hypothesis that a new procedure was commenced after the expiry of the period allowed for transposition of Directive 93/38. In that event, the question would arise whether, as the French Government argues, the criteria in Article 20(2)(c) were met.

59. It may be noted here that, although critical of Article 104(II) of the French Public Procurement Code, the Commission does not seek any declaration of failure to fulfil obligations with regard to the inclusion in that provision of a derogation on the basis of substantial prior investment. Nor, in its defence, does France seek to rely on that article; it argues, rather, that the Community derogation applied. That aspect may thus be ignored, and it is also irrelevant for present purposes whether there may be any contradiction between Article 104(II) of the Code and Article 2(4) of Decree 93-990, implementing Directive 90/531. The question to be answered is: was there a breach of Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38 as a result of conduct after 1 July 1994?

60. The Commission submits that there should have been a call for competition because more than one undertaking could have provided a VAL system or equivalent. It produces letters from Alsthom and another undertaking - ANF Industrie, of the Bombardier Eurorail group - to the opponents of the VAL system, dating from 1995, 1996 and 1997, which it claims indicate that those undertakings would have been able at that time to submit bids in conformity with the specifications. The derogation could therefore not apply at the time of the resolution of 22 November 1996. At the hearing, the Commission argued that it was not required to prove that other undertakings could have provided equivalent systems but merely that a call for competition was required in order to establish whether that was so.

61. The French Government considers that the conditions for the derogation were met as regards both technical reasons and reasons connected with protection of exclusive rights. The basic elements and certain essential parts of the VAL system were protected by 11 patents and one design registered by Matra in France between 1975 and 1993, each with a validity of 20 years, the majority of them being extended to other Member States. Only two of them expired during the relevant period, in 1995. The name VAL was registered by Matra as a trade mark in 1987. In 1996, Alsthom stated to Semtcar that it could not meet the terms specified as regards deadlines and previous constructions. A system proposed by Alsthom for Toulouse would not receive type certification until the year 2006, whereas the Rennes system was to start operating in November 2001. No other undertakings were in a position to provide a system meeting the specific requirements of the Rennes project, nor has the Commission produced any evidence that they were.

62. The evidence before the Court is thus not unequivocal, and its assessment depends largely on the burden and standard of proof.

63. As I have pointed out, it is for the Commission to prove its case and to place the necessary evidence before the Court.

64. However, where a Member State relies on a derogation from a general rule, the Court has regularly held the burden of proof to be reversed. It has taken that approach in a number of cases concerning provisions of procurement directives either identical in substance or closely comparable to Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38. It has held that such provisions, which authorise derogations from the rules intended to ensure the effectiveness of the rights conferred by the Treaty in relation to public works contracts, must be interpreted strictly and that the burden of proving the existence of exceptional circumstances justifying a derogation lies on the person seeking to rely on those circumstances.

65. This means, I consider, that where a Member State seeks to rely on a derogation, it is for the Member State to justify its claim and not for the Commission to prove that the conditions for the derogation were not met. However, the overall burden of proof remains with the Commission; where evidence has been put forward to justify the derogation, it is up to the Commission to refute that evidence. On the totality of the evidence presented to it, the Court must be satisfied that the Commission has established its case.

66. In the present case, the French Government has produced two documents indicating that Alsthom would not have been able to provide a light railway system to specification. One is a brief letter from Alsthom to Semtcar dated 30 October 1996 (more than a year after the decision was taken to resume negotiations with Matra and less than a month before the contract with that company was finally approved) showing that Alsthom had in fact been consulted but was unable to offer a system compatible with the infrastructure already planned within the strict timetable required or to provide as a reference an identical system already in operation. The other is an extract from the minutes of Sitcar's equivalent body in Toulouse, dated 2 March 1998, from which it appears that for the second line of the light railway network in that city Alsthom proposed a system which would be operational in 2006, whereas the Rennes line was to start operating in November 2001.

67. The Commission has produced a letter from Alsthom to one of the councillors opposed to the VAL project, dated 23 November 1995 (two months after the decision to resume negotiations with Matra and one year before the final approval of the contract). It is clear from that letter that at that date Alsthom, having supplied similar though not identical systems in the past, considered itself perfectly capable of providing a fully automatic reserved-track system in Rennes in accordance with the specifications and wished to submit a tender if given the opportunity. In addition, Alsthom stated that several industrial undertakings were in a position to supply a system and that a failure to allow them to compete with Matra would be anomalous under the current legislation. The Commission has also produced technical descriptions by ANF Industrie of automatic urban light railway systems supplied by it in the USA and Canada prior to 1995.

68. Those documents, I consider, adequately refute the evidence produced by the French Government and establish that at least one other contractor could and would have responded had a call for competition been issued in September 1995.

69. In those circumstances, I take the view that, if the procedure leading to the final award is held to have commenced in September 1995, it cannot be concluded from the totality of the evidence before the Court that for technical reasons or reasons connected with the protection of exclusive rights the contract could be executed only by a particular contractor; the derogation in Article 20(2)(c) of Directive 93/38 thus did not apply and, by not publishing a call for competition in the Official Journal of the European Communities, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under that provision and consequently also under Article 4(2) of the same directive.

Conclusion

70. Nevertheless, on the basis of the view I have reached as to the applicability of the Community rules to the initial stages of the procedure in issue, I conclude that the Court should:

(1) dismiss the application; and

(2) order the Commission to pay the costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Fennelly delivered on 18 May 2000.
Telaustria Verlags GmbH and Telefonadress GmbH v Telekom Austria AG, joined party: Herold Business Data AG.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public service contracts - Directive 92/50/EEC - Public service contracts in the telecommunications sector - Directive 93/38/EEC - Public service concession.
Case C-324/98.

1. The essential question raised in this preliminary reference from the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office, hereinafter the BVA), Austria is whether public service concession contracts are excluded from the scope of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts and Council Directive 93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors. If they are excluded, the further question of the determination of the scope of that exclusion arises. A number of other issues, such as whether those parts of a contract that fall within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC may be severed from those which do not and the distinction between contracts for the supply of services and supply contracts, are also raised.

I The legal and factual background

A Community law

2. The eighth recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50/EEC states:

Whereas the provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts; whereas the provision of services on other bases, such as law or regulations, or employment contracts, is not covered....

Article 1 of that Directive provides that:

For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) public service contracts shall mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority, to the exclusion of:

...

(v) contracts for voice telephony, telex, radiotelephony, paging and satellite services....

3. The 24th recital in the preamble to Directive 93/38/EEC states:

Whereas the provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts; whereas the provision of services on other bases, such as law, regulations or administrative provisions or employment contracts, is not covered.

Article 1(4) of that Directive provides that:

"supply, works and service contracts" shall mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one of the contracting entities referred to in Article 2, and a supplier, a contractor or a service provider, having as their object:

(c) in the case of service contracts, any object other than those referred to in (a) and (b) and to the exclusion of:

...

(iii) contracts for arbitration and conciliation services;

(iv) contracts for the issue, sale, purchase or transfer of securities or other financial instruments;

(vi) ... Contracts which include the provision of services and supplies shall be regarded as supply contracts if the total value of supplies is greater than the value of the services covered by the contract ....

Under Article 2(1), it is stated that the Directive shall apply to contracting entities which:

(a) are public authorities or public undertakings and exercise one of the activities referred to in paragraph 2....

Article 2(2) provides, in so far as is material, that [r]elevant activities for the purposes of this Directive include:

...

(d) the provision or operation of public telecommunications networks or the provision of one or more public telecommunications services...

B Austrian law and the facts of the main proceedings

4. The Post & Telekom Austria AG (hereinafter the PTA) is the successor in law, with effect from 1 January 1997, of the former Post & Telegraphenverwaltung (Post and Telegraph Administration). The Post & Telegraphenverwaltung was entrusted with operating the Austrian postal and telecommunications monopoly, which included the legal obligation to provide telephone directories. It had, however, for economic reasons, decided in 1992 to seek a partner to assist it in the preparation of the Amtliches Telephonbuch (Official Telephone Directory, now known as the White Pages). A contract (though seemingly not in the form of a concession) was concluded in 1992, which expired at the end of 1997. In view of the pending expiry of that contract, the PTA proposed, by advertisement published on 15 May 1997 in the Amtsblatt zur Wiener Zeitung (bulletin annexed to the Austrian Official Journal), as well as in certain newspapers, to grant a concession to produce directories and electronic databases of its subscribers. The concessionaire would, in return for undertaking this obligation, be permitted profitably to exploit the concession, while the PTA would take a 40% stake in the company to be set up by the concessionaire for that purpose. The concession was shortly afterwards awarded to Herold Business Data AG (HBD), which would appear to be a corporate successor in law of the company which had been awarded the initial 1992 contract. The concession was later concluded on 15 December 1997.

5. On 1 August 1997, the Telekommunikationsgesetz (Telecommunications Law, hereinafter the TKA) entered into force. Article 19 of the TKA requires each provider of a public oral-telephone service to maintain, inter alia, an up-to-date telephone list of subscribers, information about its subscribers' numbers and a directory, available at least weekly, in a readable electronic form on request to the regulatory authority established under that Law. Users are to have access to this information, which must be available at a reasonable charge, as part of the universal telephone service in Austria under Article 24(1) and (2) of the TKA. The regulatory authority is required, under Article 26(1) of the TKA, to ensure that a global telephone directory, combining the information contained in the various individual directories, is made available. Individual operators are, moreover, required, under Article 96(1), to produce a telephone book, which may, inter alia, be in printed and/or electronic form.

6. The applicants in the main proceedings, Telaustria and Telefonadress, took the view that the procurement procedures prescribed by the Community and Austrian legal provisions on public service contracts should have been applied to the contract in question. Following separate but subsequently joined applications made by the applicants for an arbitration procedure under Article 109 of the Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law, hereinafter the BVerG), an advisory opinion in their favour was issued by the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Procurement Review Commission), which concluded, on 20 June 1997, that the BVerG rules were applicable.

7. The PTA chose not to comply with this recommendation but continued negotiations in respect of the contract as advertised. In its view, the contract at issue was covered by the express exclusion of concessions of services from the scope of the BVerG pursuant to Article 3(1)(8) of that Law. On 24 June 1997 Telaustria, later joined by Telefonadress, applied to the BVA for a re-examination procedure as well as for interim relief. Having initially granted an interim order in favour of the applicants, the BVA later, on 10 July 1997, decided provisionally to permit the proposed contract between the PTA and HBD to be concluded, on condition that it could be rescinded if the Community procurement rules were later found to be applicable to it.

8. The order for reference states that the TKA applies to the contract concluded between the PTA and HBD. On its establishment as a corporation, the PTA became a 100% publicly owned company. It is under the control of the Austrian authorities and, in the BVA's view, constitutes a public undertaking for the purposes of Article 2(1)(a) of Directive 93/38/EEC and, therefore, also a contracting entity for the purpose of that Directive.

9. The BVA describes the impugned contract as involving... several partly interlocking contracts of differing content but between the same parties. It states that the subject-matter of the printing contract is the production of printed telephone directories.

The BVA points out that HBD must provide services involving, first: collection, processing and arrangement of subscriber data, and making the data technically accessible, in other words services within CPC No 841b, [] "development of software packages", No 8431, "data processing and tabulation services", No 8432, "data gathering services", and No 8439, "other data processing services", possibly also No 844, "services of data banks". It describes these services as falling within category 7, "Computer and related services", of Annex XVI A of Directive 93/38/EEC.

10. The second part of the contract concerns the production of printed telephone directories, which are described as being services in category 15, "Publishing and printing services on a fee or contract basis", for the purpose of Annex XVI A of Directive 93/38/EEC. The final part of the contract described by the BVA comprises services within CPC No 871, "Advertising services", which are thus services within the meaning of category 13 of Annex XVI A of Directive 93/38/EEC. In the BVA's opinion, the proportion of services listed in Annex XVI A of Directive 93/38/EEC outweighs those in Annex XVI B, so that that Directive may be regarded as being applicable to the contract as a whole.

11. Taking the view that the exclusion of public service concessions from the scope of Directive 92/50/EEC does not necessarily support the PTA's assertion that such contracts are also excluded from the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC and having regard to the uncertain scope of what should be understood as such concessions, the BVA has referred the seven questions quoted below to the Court:

Principal question:

Can it be inferred from the legislative history of Directive 92/50/EEC, in particular the proposal of the Commission (COM (90) 372 final, OJ 1991 C 23, p. 1), or from the definition of the term "public service contract" in Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50/EEC, that certain categories of contracts concluded by contracting authorities subject to that directive with undertakings which provide services are to be excluded a priori from the scope of the directive, solely on the basis of certain common characteristics as specified in that proposal of the Commission, without the need to rely on Article 1(a)(i) to (viii) or Articles 4 to 6 of Directive 92/50/EEC?;

If the principal question is answered in the affirmative:

Do such categories of contracts also exist, having regard in particular to the 24th recital in the preamble to Directive 93/38/EEC, within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC?;

If the second question is answered in the affirmative:

May those categories of contracts excluded from the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC be adequately described, by analogy with Commission proposal COM (90) 372, as having as their essential feature that a contracting entity which falls within the scope ratione personae of Directive 93/38/EEC cedes a service for which it is responsible to an undertaking of its choice in return for the right to operate the service concerned for financial gain?;

Supplementary to the first three questions:

Is a contracting entity which falls within the scope ratione personae of Directive 93/38/EEC obliged, where a contract concluded by it contains elements of a service contract within the meaning of Article 1(4)(a) of Directive 93/38/EEC together with elements of a different contractual nature which are not within the scope of that directive, to sever the part of the overall contract which is subject to Directive 93/38/EEC, in so far as that is technically possible and economically reasonable, and make that part the subject of a procurement procedure under Article 1(7) of that directive, as the Court of Justice held in Case C-3/88 before the entry into force of Directive 92/50/EEC with respect to a contract which was not subject as a whole to Directive 77/62/EEC?;

If that question is answered in the affirmative,

Is the contractual concession of the exclusive right to operate a service for financial gain, which will give the service provider an income which cannot be determined but which in the light of general experience will not be inconsiderable and may be expected to exceed the costs of providing the service, to be regarded as payment for the provision of the service, as the Court of Justice held in Case C-272/91 [] in connection with a supply contract and a right ceded by the public authorities in lieu of payment?;

Supplementary to the above questions:

Are the provisions of Article 1(4)(a) and (c) of Directive 93/38/EEC to be interpreted as meaning that a contract which provides for the provision of services within the meaning of Annex XVI A, category 15, loses the nature of a service contract and becomes a supply contract if the result of the service is the production of a large number of identical tangible objects which have an economic value and thus constitute goods within the meaning of Articles 9 and 30 of the EC Treaty?;

If that question is answered in the affirmative:

Is the judgment of the Court of Justice in Case C-3/88 to be interpreted as meaning that such a supply contract is to be severed from the other components of the service contract and made the subject of a procurement procedure under Article 1(7) of Directive 93/38/EEC, in so far as this is technically possible and economically reasonable?

II Observations

12. Written observations have been submitted by Telaustria, the PTA, the Kingdom of Denmark, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the French Republic, the Republic of Austria and the Commission. All of these, save Denmark and the Netherlands, also presented oral observations.

III Analysis

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

13. In my view, the issues raised by the various questions referred by the national court may be summarised as follows:

(i) Is the contract in the present case, assuming that Community public-procurement rules apply, governed by Directive 93/38/EEC?;

(ii) Are public service concessions excluded from the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC?;

(iii) What is the scope of a public service concession contract in Community law and how are such concessions to be defined?;

(iv) If the relevant advertising rules of the Community procurement directives are not applicable, what, if any, publicity requirements would flow from the application of general Treaty principles?;

(v) In the event of Directive 93/38/EEC being inapplicable, does the fact that the concession is intended to lead to the production of a large number of (physical) telephone directories mean that it should be regarded, in whole or in part, as a supply contract and, thus, subject to the procurement rules of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts?

Although there are certain overlaps between these issues, I propose, for convenience, to deal with them in turn.

A Directive 92/50/EEC or Directive 93/38/EEC

14. If Directive 93/38/EEC were applicable to a contract such as that between the PTA and HBD it would be unnecessary to provide any specific answer to the first question referred by the BVA. It is therefore appropriate, in my view, to consider first the possible applicability of the sectoral directive before examining other more general directives. However, even if Directive 93/38/EEC were alone applicable in the present case, it would preclude consideration of other Community public procurement rules for the purposes of assisting in the interpretation of that Directive.

15. It is clear from the order for reference that the PTA, as a publicly owned telecommunications-services provider, falls, in principle, to be considered as a contracting entity for the purpose of Article 2(1) of Directive 93/38/EEC. Support for this view may also be derived from the 13th recital in the preamble to that Directive, which states that its scope should not extend to activities of those entities ... which fall outside the telecommunications sector. Directive 93/38/EEC only applies, in accordance with its Article 2(1), where a contracting entity exercises one of the activities referred to in paragraph 2, which include the provision or operation of public telecommunications networks or the provision of one or more public telecommunications services.... While it may no longer be the only provider of such services active on the Austrian market, the BVA has itself described the PTA's tasks as including the provision and operation of public telecommunications networks and the offering of public telecommunications services. It is, as the Commission submits, clearly a sectoral contracting entity. It is common case that the production of both physical and electronic telephone directories is directly related to the provision of those services.

16. The BVA has itself provisionally taken the view that the services involved in the contract between the PTA and HBD, viewed as a whole, fall within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC, and, more particularly, that it should be regarded as being a supply contract for the purpose of Article 15 thereof. In order to determine whether the contract at issue comes within the material scope of Directive 93/38/EEC, there is nothing in the information available to the Court that would call into question the BVA's assessment that, but for the fact that it may be excluded by reason of constituting a concession, the contract should be considered to fall within the scope of that Directive. In my opinion, it is unnecessary, for the purpose of answering the questions referred, to take a view on whether it would constitute a supply or service contract. This is because, if a contract like that at issue in the main proceedings may be considered to be a supply or a service contract within the meaning of Article 1(4) of Directive 93/38/EEC, then the publicity rules prescribed by either Article 15 or 16 of that Directive would apply.

17. I do not agree with the PTA that the services which fall within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC are only those which occur at the end of a long chain of services and which, in so far as the present case is concerned, relate directly to the actual provision of voice-telephony services. It emerges clearly from the 17th recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50/EEC that the provisions of that Directive were not intended to affect the predecessor to Directive 93/38/EEC; in other words, where a contract falls within the scope of the sectoral Directive, the more general provisions of Directive 92/50/EEC are inapplicable. While the services included within the scope of the latter are listed, inter alia, in Annex I A to the Directive and include telecommunications services (category 5), it is clear from the footnote accompanying that category that voice-telephony services are excluded. Only a very narrow interpretation of the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC would justify the PTA's view that a contract concerning the production of telephone directories is insufficiently related to the provision of voice-telephony services for that Directive to be applicable. In my view, such a narrow construction is misconceived. It is particularly relevant, as noted in the order for reference, that category 15 of Annex XVI to Directive 93/38/EEC expressly includes publishing or printing services as being among the services covered by the publicity procedures required under Article 15.

18. Moreover, Article 1(4) of Directive 93/38/EEC describes, inter alia, the service contracts covered by that Directive as being contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one of the contracting entities referred to in Article 2, and a supplier, a contractor or a service provider, and which have as their object (see Article 1(4)(ii)) voice telephony... services. Accordingly, I am satisfied that the BVA has correctly assumed that Directive 93/38/EEC is, in principle, the applicable directive in the present case. The issue raised by the second, third and fifth questions (as well as indirectly by the first question) should therefore be interpreted as being whether the concession nature of the contract between the PTA and HBD precludes the application of Directive 93/38/EEC. In reality, this is the core issue in this case.

B The exclusion of public service concessions

19. The applicants submit that public service concessions should not be viewed as falling outside the Community procurement rules because such an interpretation would subject those rules to the variation in the activities that are considered to be public activities in the various national laws. The need to interpret exceptions from the scope of the public procurement rules narrowly precludes such an exception. Alternatively, if concessions are excluded, there must be a genuine transfer of an activity that is in the public interest for it to comprise a public service concession. This, they allege, is not the case as regards the production of telephone directories. They point to the fact that there was no express Commission proposal to include public service concessions within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC and conclude that it would be unjustified to deduce an exclusion of such contracts from the silence of the Directive on the matter.

20. The PTA, supported by the intervening Member States and the Commission, essentially submits that it is clear from the legislative history of Directive 92/50/EEC, as well as from consideration of the overall scope of the Community procurement directives, that the Council did not wish to include concessions within the scope of either that Directive or Directive 93/38/EEC. The material scope of the latter Directive is limited to the types of contract therein included, of which concessions are not an example.

21. In my view, it is perfectly clear that the Council rejected the Commission's proposal to include concessions within the scope of Directive 92/50/EEC. In its initial proposal, submitted on 13

December 1990, public service concessions were distinguished from public service contracts in Article 1(a)(vi), defined in Article 1(a)(h) and subjected to the publicity rules of the proposed directive by Article 2. Apart from a more developed definition of a public service concession, essentially similar provisions were included in the amended proposal submitted on 28 August 1991. The initial rationale given by the Commission for their inclusion appeared in the 10th recital of the proposal, where the Commission stated that in order to ensure coherent award procedures, public service concessions should be covered by this Directive in the same way as Directive 71/305/EEC applies to public works concessions. The reference to the latter directive was dropped in the 10th recital of the amended proposal, which simply stated that the inclusion of public service concessions was necessary to ensure coherent award procedures. During the legislative process, the Council decided to eliminate all references to public service concession from the proposal. Its reasoning appears in the document setting out the reasons for its common position and cited by France in its written observations. The Council's decision can only, as France submits, be construed as an express refusal to include such concessions within the scope of Directive 92/50/EEC.

22. It is in this light that I interpret the failure of the Commission even to propose the inclusion of public service concessions in its proposal, submitted on 27 September 1991, for what became Council Directive 93/38/EEC to be significant. More significant still, however, is the fact that in its amended proposal for what became the predecessor directive to Directive 93/38/EEC namely, Council Directive 90/531/EEC of 17 September 1990 on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, the first sectoral public procurement directive the Commission had proposed certain provisions to regulate public service concessions. This proposal was not accepted by the Council because such concessions occurred in only one Member State and the Council deemed it inappropriate to proceed with their regulation in the absence of a detailed study of the diverse forms of public service concessions accorded in the Member States in respect of the water, gas and electricity sectors. This assessment of the legislative history clearly demonstrates that the silence of Directive 93/38/EEC in respect of concessions was intentional and clearly designed to exclude them. In the present case, it therefore provides a clear aid to construing the text of the Directive as finally adopted by the Council.

23. I would draw additional support for this view from the directives dealing with public works contracts. In the first public procurement directive, Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, Article 3(1) expressly excluded concession contracts from the scope of the public works contracts defined in Article 1(a) as contracts for pecuniary consideration concluded in writing between a contractor... and an awarding authority which were subject to it. In 1989, Council Directive 89/440/EEC of 18 July 1989 amending Directive 71/305/EEC concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts adopted a definition of public works concession (see the new Article 1(d) inserted by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/440/EEC) and included advertising rules to be applied to the award of such concessions (see the new Article 1b inserted by Article 1(2) of Directive 89/440/EEC). This is highly significant because, for the first time, the Community public procurement rules expressly addressed the phenomenon of concessions. At the time of the award of the contract at issue in the main proceedings, the relevant provisions were those contained in the consolidated directive which replaced Directive 71/305/EEC, namely Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts. This Directive was adopted on the same day as Directive 93/38/EEC. It is, therefore, to my mind obvious that if the Council had wished to include public service concession within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC it would have done so expressly, as it did when adopting Directive 93/37/EEC. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from its omission to do so is that which has already been drawn by Advocate General La Pergola in his Opinion in Arnhem and Rheden, namely that Directive 93/38/EEC covers only service contracts.

24. It is, consequently, clear that the Community public procurement law notion of contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing (my emphasis), which appears in all directives from Directive 71/305/EEC, the first directive, up to and including Directive 93/38/EEC, has never encompassed concessions. It is not possible to argue, as the applicants implicitly do, that a literal interpretation of that notion, as it now appears in Article 1(4) of Directive 93/38/EEC, would permit written concession-type agreements, where the consideration is obtainable whether wholly by exploitation or partly by both exploitation and payment from the awarding entity, to fall within its scope. In other words, even if the legislative history were to be overlooked, a contextual construction of the notion of pecuniary interest, which would be necessary given that it is not defined in Directive 93/38/EEC, would exclude concessions.

25. It follows, in my opinion, that the Court should rule that public service concessions do not fall within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC.

C The scope of the notion of public service concessions

26. Since I take the view that public service concessions are excluded from the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC, it is necessary, in order to answer the third and fifth questions referred by the national court, to consider the type of arrangement that may be viewed as such a concession and, thus, excluded from the publicity rules of that Directive. In doing so, I am conscious that the Community legislature, except where concessions have explicitly been included, has not found it necessary to define the notion of public service concessions. In those circumstances, I agree both with the Member States who have intervened in this case and with the Commission that, in the absence of a legislative definition, criteria for identifying what constitutes a concession need to be identified by the Court so as to assist the BVA to make its final decision in the present case.

27. The applicants submit that the essence of a concession resides in the fact that no remuneration is paid by the granting entity to the concessionaire. The latter must therefore simply be given the right economically to exploit the concession, although this right may, in their view, be accompanied by a requirement to pay consideration to the grantor. They also contend that the subject-matter of the concession must concern a public interest service related to the exercise of public power. This is not the case here, in their view, since each telecommunications-service provider is obliged by Article 96(1) of the TKA to publish a directory.

28. The observations of the other parties and interveners who have submitted observations are largely ad idem as regards the main distinctive features of a concession. They would classify a concession by reference to three essential characteristics. First, the beneficiary of the service provided must be third parties rather than the awarding entity itself. Second, the subject of the service ceded must concern a matter which is in the public interest. Finally, the concessionaire must assume the economic risk related to the performance of the service at issue.

29. In the first place, it is important to bear in mind that public service concessions are not covered by Directive 93/38/EEC. I do not therefore accept, as the applicants have submitted, that it is necessary to interpret their scope narrowly. They do not constitute derogations from the publicity rules of the Directive but rather a type of arrangement that is not covered by the Directive and thus beyond the remit of those rules.

30. It seems to me that an appropriate starting point would be the definition contained in the public works directives, since this is the only definition which has been approved to date by the Community legislature. Article 1(d) of Directive 89/440/EEC initially defined a public works concession as a contract of the same type as ["public works contracts"] except for the fact that consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the construction or in this right together with payment. The justification for including such concessions within the scope of the Directive was set out in the 11th recital in its preamble and was cited as being the increasing importance of concession contracts in the public works area and of their specific nature.... An identical definition of a public works concession along with an identical justification for the inclusion of such concessions was later retained in Directive 93/37/EEC. In my view, the Community legislature has viewed the absence of, at least full, consideration passing from the granting entity to the concessionaire as constituting the essence of a concession. I agree that this represents a fundamental feature of a concession whose importance is not limited to those which are concerned with public works. This feature, to my mind, finds expression in the fact that the concessionaire itself must bear the principal, or at least the substantive, economic risk attaching to the performance of the service involved. If the national court is satisfied that the economic burden or risk has effectively been passed to the concessionaire by the grantor of the concession, then there must be a very strong presumption that the arrangement concluded between them amounts to a concession rather than a contract.

31. To my mind, the single most important indication of whether economic risk is to be borne by the concessionaire will emerge from examining the nature of the exploitation in which the supposed concession requires it to engage. Arnhem and Rheden provides a strong indication that the Court views the requirement to exploit the right ceded in order to obtain remuneration as the core of what constitutes a genuine concession. In response to an argument raised by France in its observations that the contracts at issue in that case (which concerned a joint venture between two Dutch municipalities to provide municipal refuse-collection and road-cleaning services through ARA, a company set up expressly for that purpose) could be regarded as a public service concession, the Court declared, without finding it necessary to interpret that term, that it was clear from the underlying agreement that the remuneration paid to ARA comprises only a price and not the right to operate a service.

32. Reference was made at the hearing to a draft communication from the Commission on the interpretation in Community law of public procurement concessions. In that communication, to which various references were made at the hearing, the Commission sets out a number of illustrations of circumstances which had come to its attention but which, in its view, did not satisfy the requirement that the risk be borne by the concessionaire. Thus, where, for example, the public authorities effectively guarantee to indemnify the concessionaire against future losses, or where there is no effective exploitation by the concessionaire of the service whose performance is ceded, the Commission submits that the arrangement at issue could not amount to a concession.

33. I would, however, agree with the observations of France to the effect that there is no overriding definition of a public services concession. All that is clear, as Lottomatica and Arnhem and Rheden reveal, is that where the remuneration is fixed or determinable the arrangement should be viewed as contractual and falling, prima facie, within the scope of the relevant procurement directive. In Lottomatica, the Italian State had published a contract notice for the purported concession of the computerisation of the Italian Lotto. Italy alleged that as a concession to carry out a public service it was not covered by Directive 77/62/EEC. The Court rejected this plea. It held that the introduction of the computerised system in question does not involve any transfer of responsibilities to the concessionaire in respect of the various operations inherent in the lottery and that it was common ground that the contract at issue relate[d] to the supply of an integrated computerised system including in particular the supply of certain foods to the administration. The fact that the system was only to become the property of the administration at the end of the contractual relationship with the tenderer was irrelevant, because the "price" for the supply [took] the form of an annual payment in proportion to revenue. It is, therefore, necessary in each case to look at a number of factors which will indicate whether in reality the arrangement between the parties amounts to a written contract for a pecuniary interest in respect of the provision of services. There is a general consensus in the observations as to the relevance of the other criteria cited by Advocate

General La Pergola in his Opinion in Arnhem and Rheden, to wit that in the case of a concession, the beneficiary of the service is a third party unconnected with the contractual relationship. Although I would not reject entirely the potential assistance which may be derived from this factor in certain borderline cases, it would seem to me to add little to the requirement that the concessionaire effectively obtain at least a significant proportion of its remuneration not from the granting entity but from the exploitation of the service. If, in reality, its only customer were from the outset to be the awarding entity, as opposed to third parties, it is difficult to see how the arrangement between them could escape classification as a contract for pecuniary interest. Indeed, such a situation would approximate to the facts of Lottomatica, where the only customer of the purported concessionaire was clearly the public administration responsible for conducting lotteries in Italy.

34. There is less consensus in the observations submitted regarding the relevance of the public interest nature of the service ceded. In his Opinion in Arnhem and Rheden, Advocate General La Pergola expressed the view that [u]nder Community law, the service that is the subject of a service concession must also be in the general interest, so that a public authority is institutionally responsible for providing it. He went on to say that [t]he fact that a third party provides the service means that the concessionaire replaces the authority granting the concession in respect of its obligations to ensure that the service is provided for the community. Contrary to the applicants' submission, I would not read the judgment in Data-processing as supporting this view. The reference to public service in that case was related to the Court's rejection of Italy's plea in that case that the development of the data-processing systems for the performance of certain public activities was in itself a public service activity which was excluded from the scope of Directive 77/62/EEC. The Court held that neither the supply of the equipment required nor the design of the system itself, although enabl[ing] the authorities to carry out their duties [,]... in themselves constitute[d] a public service.

35. It would appear that the supposed relevance of the general interest nature of the service that is the subject of the concession derives from the definition proposed by the Commission in both its initial and amended proposals for a procurement directive concerning public service contracts, where it referred, at Article 1(h) in both cases, to the transfer by an awarding authority of the execution of a service to the public lying within its responsibility. I doubt whether the notion of a service to the public should, save in the broadest sense of the word, be construed as requiring that it be one that is in the general interest. On the contrary, it seems to me that it should merely refer to the fact that the typical intended beneficiaries of a genuine public service concession will be third-party members of the general public or a particular category of that general public. I certainly do not consider that it is necessary for the service at issue to be capable of being regarded as a service of general economic interest in the sense in which that notion has been interpreted for the purposes of applying Article 90 of the EC Treaty (now Article 86 EC). In other words, there should, in my opinion, be no qualitative bar to the sorts of service that a contracting entity may legitimately seek to award by way of concession, although it is likely that there will be a public interest in most of the services that are awarded in that manner.

36. In any event, I do not see how the Court could devise criteria for determining what may or may not properly be viewed as being in the public interest. To my mind, the adoption of the view that only public interest services are proper matters for public service concessions and of the concomitant required definition of such interests are plainly matters for the Community legislature if it opts to harmonise, in the interests of the internal market, the rules regarding such concessions. This is borne out by the fact that, at the hearing, the Commission accepted that there was no clear definition of public interest in Austrian law and that it must be left to the national courts to determine its scope. Acceptance of such a principle would, of course, be a recipe for the non-uniform application of Directive 92/50/EEC, with certain national courts taking the view that the Directive applied to concessions because the subject-matter of the service ceded was not capable of being regarded as falling within the public interest of the relevant Member State. It should be avoided. In any event, it is unnecessary to adopt any final view on this matter in the present case because I agree with the submission made by the PTA at the hearing that, once the performance of an obligation has been imposed by public law as that at issue in the present case has by virtue of Articles 26(1) and 96(1) of the TKA , its performance may be deemed to be in the public interest of the Member State concerned. It should also be irrelevant whether the awarding entity is the only entity or merely one of a number of entities which is subject to the obligation in question and whether overall responsibility for ensuring the performance of the obligation is imposed upon a regulatory authority.

37. In summary, therefore, a case-by-case approach should be adopted to the question of whether a contract amounts to a concession or a service contract which takes account of all indicative factors, the most important of which is whether the supposed concession amounts to a conferral of a right to exploit a particular service as well as the simultaneous transfer of a significant proportion of the risk associated with that transfer to the concessionaire.

38. In their observations the applicants have advanced various arguments which seek to demonstrate that, in reality, the PTA is providing consideration to HBD. In the context of a preliminary reference, it is not for this Court to make any findings in this respect which remain exclusively a matter for the court or tribunal which has referred the case. However, as it emerges clearly particularly from the BVA's fifth question that it entertains doubts as to the degree of economic risk that must be borne by a concessionaire, it may be of assistance to it to consider briefly some of the allegations made by the applicants. They assert that the grant to HBD of the right to use the PTA logo is of considerable economic value. This coupled with the facts that all of the cost factors involved for HBD are relatively easy to determine in advance and that the possibility of selling advertising space in the directories amounts, as was asserted at the hearing, to a real gold-mine gives the lie, in the applicants' view, to the claim that HBD undertook any real economic risk.

39. Naturally, this assessment is hotly contested by the PTA. It points out that paragraph 16 of the contract expressly confers the responsibility of producing the directory on HBD. It submits that it has licensed HBD, in return for payment, to use its data for the purpose of producing that directory. However, this licence is not different from that which it would be willing to grant to any other economic operator who wished to exploit that information. As regards the logo, it has not authorised HBD to use its trade mark but has in fact obliged it to do so. This is an arrangement which is for its benefit because it profits from certain free and advantageously placed advertising in the directory. Moreover, the fact that the PTA has paid for the acquisition of a shareholding in HBD, which transaction is wholly independent of the concession, cannot be regarded as consideration paid to the latter in respect of that concession.

40. In my view, the mere fact that there is a likelihood that the concessionaire will be able beneficially to exploit the concession would not suffice to permit a national court or tribunal to conclude that there is no economic risk. To my mind, a national court or tribunal would need to be satisfied to a high degree of probability that the possibility of loss was minimal or even non-existent. Although it is for the BVA in the present case to make that determination, I am unconvinced that assertions such as those made by the applicants satisfy the test of no real or effective risk. HBD has to pay for the use of the data, which data could be obtained on the same terms by other economic operators. The requirement imposed on HBD to use the PTA's logo is clearly of economic benefit to the PTA. The mere fact that it might also benefit HBD does not render the concession into a contract since the extent of that benefit is not quantifiable in advance.

D General Treaty requirements

41. It is common case in the observations submitted to the Court that, even if the grant of public service concessions falls outside the scope of Directives 92/50/EEC and 93/38/EEC, the awarding authorities are, none the less, bound to respect the Treaty. It is also accepted that Articles 52 and 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Articles 43 EC and 49 EC) would, in particular, preclude all direct and indirect discrimination based on nationality. In other words, awarding authorities must respect the principle of equal treatment between tenderers. They must also ensure that no conditions are imposed on the tenderer that would, in themselves, amount to an infringement of, for example, Article 30 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 28 EC). It is not submitted in this case that any of those Treaty provisions have, at least directly, been infringed.

42. The Commission, however, asserts that entities awarding public service concessions are also under a more general obligation, which it appears to derive from the objectives underlying Articles 30, 52 and 59 of the EC Treaty, to ensure the transparency of the award procedures. At the hearing the Commission referred to Unitrans Scandinavia and Others v Ministeriet for Fødevarer, Landbrug og Fiskeri in support of this view. That case concerned the obligations affecting a body other than a contracting authority, but upon which special or exclusive rights to engage in a public service activity have been granted by such an authority, when that body awards public supply contracts to third parties. The Court held that the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality cannot be interpreted restrictively [and that] it implies, in particular, an obligation of transparency in order to enable the contracting authority to satisfy itself that it has been complied with. In answer to questions at the hearing regarding the scope of this obligation, the Commission was unwilling to suggest that it would extend to requiring publication of proposed public service concessions.

43. I consider that substantive compliance with the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality requires that the award of concessions respect a minimum degree of publicity and transparency. I agree with the Commission that what must at all costs be avoided is that their grant be shrouded in secrecy or opacity. I also accept the point made by the agent for Austria that publicity should not necessarily be equated with publication. Thus, if the awarding entity addresses itself directly to a number of potential tenderers, and assuming the latter are not all or nearly all undertakings having the same nationality as that entity, the requirement of transparency would, in my view, be respected. Transparency, in this context, is therefore concerned with ensuring the fundamental fairness and openness of the award procedures, particularly as regards potential tenderers who are not established in the Member State of the awarding authority. It does not, however, in my opinion require the awarding entity to apply by analogy the provisions of the most relevant of the Community procurement directives.

44. In any event, in the present case, there can be little doubt that a sufficient degree of transparency was respected. The offer was published in the Austrian Official Journal, in some of the Austrian newspapers and in certain leading international newspapers. Moreover, it is not suggested that the information published in the latter differed from that published in the former. I would conclude that this degree of publicity prima facie satisfied the requirement of transparency. The applicants, however, submit that, in the absence of publication of the results of the pilot programme run under the earlier contract with HBD's predecessor between 1992 and 1997, it was impossible for any tenderer other than HBD effectively to tender for the proposed concession. The accuracy of this assertion cannot be verified by this Court. In my opinion, unless the BVA is satisfied that such publication, or the making available of the information concerned to serious potential interested tenderers, was crucial for ensuring the effectiveness of their tenders, it must conclude that the procedure adopted and followed by the PTA was not incompatible with Community law.

E Severance of the contract

45. The question of the distinction between service and supply contracts, which is raised by the

BVA's fourth, sixth and seventh questions, would arise only in the event that the Court were to find that, notwithstanding the concession aspects of a contract such as that at issue in the main proceedings, Directive 93/38/EEC was in principle applicable. Since I take the view that a concession like that at issue in the main proceedings should be considered to fall outside the scope of that Directive, provided the substantive burden of the economic risk involved in the exploitation of the service in question is transferred to the concessionaire, I address this issue very much in the alternative.

46. In reality, the BVA wishes to know whether a contract which could be classified as containing a supply element, to wit the production of telephone directories for or on behalf of the PTA, would fall to be considered within the scope of the temporally material supplies directive, namely Directive 93/36/EEC. It seems to me that the answer to this question is provided clearly by Article 1(4) of Directive 93/38/EEC (quoted in paragraph 3 above). Thus, contracts which include both the provision of services and supplies shall be regarded as supply contracts if the total value of supplies is greater than the value of the services covered by the contract. The Court too has recognised, especially in Gestion Hotelera Internacional, the importance of determining the predominant element of a contract where its component elements may fall within the scope of two discrete Community procurement directives. However, [i]t is for the national court to determine whether the works are incidental to the main object of the award. It is therefore for the national court, in applying Article 1(4) of Directive 93/38/EEC, to determine whether, in fact, the value of what may be regarded as supplies exceeds that which may only be classified as services. If this were the case, and assuming the contract at issue is not found to constitute a public service concession, the procurement rules of Directive 93/36/EEC would alone be applicable to it.

IV Conclusion

47. In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the questions referred by the Bundesvergabeamt be answered as follows:

(1) The provision or operation of public telecommunications networks or the provision of one or more public telecommunications services for the purposes of Article 2(2)(d) of Council Directive 93/38/EEC includes contracts concerned with the production of telephone directories;

(2) Public service concessions do not fall within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC;

(3) In the absence of a definition adopted by the Community legislature of the notion of public service concessions, it is necessary in each case for the national court or tribunal to look at all the factors which are capable of indicating whether, in reality, the arrangement between the parties amounts to a written contract for a pecuniary interest in respect of the provision of services. The predominant and characteristic feature of such a concession is the grant of a right to exploit a particular service together with the associated economic risk;

(4) Substantive compliance with the Treaty-based principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality requires that the award of public service concessions respect a minimum degree of publicity and transparency, the purpose of which should be to ensure fundamental fairness in the awarding procedures and a reasonable opportunity for tenderers who are not established in the Member State of the awarding entity to submit tenders;

(5) Contracts falling within the scope of Directive 93/38/EEC which include components concerned with the provision of services and supplies shall by virtue of Article 1(4) of that Directive be regarded as supply contracts, for the purpose of the Community-procurement rules, if the total value of supplies is greater than the value of the services covered by the contract.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 8 July 1999.
Unitron Scandinavia A/S and 3-S A/S, Danske Svineproducenters Serviceselskab v Ministeriet for Fødevarer, Landbrug og Fiskeri.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Klagenævnet for Udbud - Denmark.
Public supply contracts - Directive 93/36/EEC - Award of public supply contracts by a body other than a contracting authority.
Case C-275/98.

A - Introduction

1 The present reference for a preliminary ruling concerns two questions in connection with public procurement. On the one hand it concerns the question as to what legal significance is to be attributed to a non-discrimination clause (prohibition against discrimination on the ground of nationality) contained in a directive on procedures for the award of public supply contracts, and on the other hand whether such a non-discrimination provision contains an obligation for bodies which are not contracting authorities to carry out a (tendering) procedure in accordance with the directive when awarding (public) supply contracts.

2 The disputed provision is to be found in Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36/EEC (1) and reads as follows:

`When a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) (2) grants to a body other than a contracting authority - regardless of its legal status - special or exclusive rights to engage in a public service activity, the instrument granting this right shall stipulate that the body in question must observe the principle of non-discrimination by nationality when awarding public supply contracts to third parties.'

B - Facts

3 The dispute in the main proceedings concerns a tendering procedure with regard to eartags for pigs. The complainants, Unitron Scandinavia A/S and 3-S A/S, Danske Svineproducenters Serviceselskab (hereinafter `the complainants') wished to supply those eartags. The respondent, Ministeriet for Fødevarer, Landbrug og Fiskeri (Ministry of Foodstuffs, Agriculture and Fisheries; hereinafter `the respondent' or `the Ministry') bears the `overall responsibility' for the Danish scheme involving eartags for pigs. The award procedure, which is the subject of the complainants' grievance, was carried out by the Veterinærdirektoratet (Veterinary Department), a subordinate institution of the respondent, as well as Danske Slagterier (Danish Abattoirs), a private body.

4 In Council Directive 92/102/EEC (3) on the identification and registration of animals, rules were introduced, with a view to combating disease, concerning the marking of animals. For that purpose the Member States were to set up a central authority with the power to carry out veterinary controls. The authority was to be required to register the holdings which kept animals within the meaning of the directive. In regard to keeping pigs, the directive provides that before they leave the holding on which they are born, they are to be identified by an eartag or tattoo which will identify the holding which the animal comes from. The Danish regulation (4) provides that eartags for pigs are to be approved by the Veterinary Department, which is itself subject to the respondent. Those eartags are then sold to the individual producers via Danske Slagterier, a private body connected to the Danish agricultural organisations. The Veterinary Department fixes the price for the eartags and the supply of eartags is registered in the Ministry of Agriculture's Central Livestock Register.

5 According to the statements made in the order for reference, two kinds of eartags are in use in Denmark, those employed for slaughtered animals and those used for live animals. Eartags for the latter are ordered by pig producers from Danske Slagterier, who transmit the order to the relevant eartag supplier, who, for his part, supplies the ordered eartags directly to pig producers. Payment for the eartags is made by pig producers to Danske Slagterier. The eartags for slaughtered animals, on the other hand, are ordered directly by pig producers from the eartag supplier, who dispatches them to pig producers whilst informing Danske Slagterier. Here also, payment for the eartags is made by pig producers to Danske Slagterier. The price for both kinds of eartags is composed of the amount charged by the eartag suppliers plus DKK 0.5 per eartag. Registration of pigs in the Central Livestock Register is carried out by Danske Slagterier, for which it receives an annual fee from the Veterinary Department of DKK 400 000.

6 In 1993/94 the supply of eartags was first put out to tender. The tender specifications were drawn up by the Veterinary Department in collaboration with Danske Slagterier, whilst the latter was entrusted with the tendering procedure. The tendering procedure took place in conformity with Danish legal provisions. At the end of 1996 an additional tendering procedure was carried out at the respondent's request. An undertaking which had previously been entrusted with the supply of eartags was again awarded the supply contract. A second undertaking was also selected to supply eartags, which had not previously been awarded such a contract. Agreements were entered into with both undertakings for a duration of three years, starting on 1 April 1997. That procedure was also carried out in accordance with Danish law. A third tendering procedure, the first to be carried out in accordance with the procedure laid down in Directive 93/36, took place between October 1997 and April 1998.

7 On the grounds that they had not been considered within the 1996/97 tendering procedure, the complainants lodged an administrative complaint against the respondent with the Klagenævnet for Udbud (hereinafter `the Procurement Review Board'). They claimed that, in relation to their purchase of eartags, Danske Slagterier were to be considered a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1 of Directive 93/36 and that consequently the directive should have been applied. They argued that Danske Slagterier had carried out the administration of the eartag scheme in the public interest and had, in reality, been acting in the respondent's stead. The contracts should thus have been awarded in a tendering procedure pursuant to Directive 93/36. In the alternative, the complainants claimed that Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 should have been applied and Danske Slagterier should have been instructed by the respondent that differential treatment on the basis of nationality was not permitted, which consequently would have resulted in the tendering procedure being published throughout the entire European Union.

8 The Ministry contended that no public supply contract was involved and that Directive 93/36 was therefore inapplicable. In reality, suppliers sold the eartags to pig producers. Danske Slagterier had only been required to administer the scheme and the respondent had simply approved the eartags and paid a certain amount for the scheme's administration. The purchase of eartags had thus not taken place at public expense.

9 The Procurement Review Board assumes that Danske Slagterier were the purchasers of the eartags in question. That was due to the fact that Danske Slagterier had carried out the tendering procedure and that pig producers had paid Danske Slagterier for both types of eartags. The Procurement Review Board also assumes that Danske Slagterier are not to be considered a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/36, because no more than fifty per cent of their activities are financed by public funds.

10 The Procurement Review Board further states that, since the Ministry delegated the administration of the eartag scheme including the purchasing of the eartags to a private undertaking or a private organisation - Danske Slagterier - that service as such should have been awarded by means of a public tendering procedure. The awarding of that contract should have taken place pursuant to Directive

93/36 on the award of public supply contracts and not pursuant to Directive 92/50/EEC (5) on the award of public service contracts. That was due to the fact that, according to the information available to the Procurement Review Board, the value of the purchased eartags exceeded the value of the service in question.

11 In the matter presently at issue, the referring Procurement Review Board raises the question, first, whether the provision contained in Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 has an independent meaning. The Procurement Review Board considers it possible that this provision (6) has lost its independent meaning due to the fact that a directive on the award of public service contracts has already been adopted, namely Directive 92/50 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts. The Procurement Review Board also considers it possible that this independent meaning remains in effect, due to the fact that, in spite of amendments made to Directive 93/36, Article 2(2) remained the same.

12 Secondly, the Procurement Review Board considers what such an independent meaning might entail, given that the interests, which in this case were to be protected under Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 (supply contracts), were, in effect, those which fell under Directive 92/50 (public service contracts). In this context, the Procurement Review Board therefore wishes to know to what extent the principle of non-discrimination is to be taken into consideration when awarding public supply contracts, as well as whether Article 2(2) requires a body which does not constitute a contracting authority to carry out a tendering procedure for the award of public contracts if the value of the contracts exceeds the threshold value laid out in Directive 93/36. The question here is therefore not whether the respondent itself is required to carry out the procedure pursuant to the Directive, but rather whether Danske Slagterier were required to apply that procedure.

13 The Procurement Review Board therefore refers the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

`1. Does Article 2(2) of Council Directive 93/36/EEC coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts still have an independent meaning after the adoption of Council Directive 92/50/EEC relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (as both amended by European Parliament and Council Directive 97/52/EEC)?

2. If Question 1 is answered in the affirmative, does the provision accordingly mean that, where a contracting authority entrusts the administration of an eartagging scheme to a private undertaking which is not a contracting authority, the contracting authority should stipulate, on the one hand, that the undertaking should comply with the prohibition against discrimination on the ground of nationality in public supply contracts which the undertaking awards to third parties and, on the other hand, that the procurement of goods linked to the scheme should be put out to public tender if the value of the goods to be procured exceeds the threshold value in Council Directive 93/36?'

14 The respondent - which considers the reference for a preliminary ruling inadmissible - and the Commission have taken part in the procedure before the Court. Both have submitted written statements and declined to participate in the oral hearings. I shall refer to their arguments as far as may be necessary in the course of my analysis.

C - Opinion

1. Admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling

(a) Whether the Procurement Review Board constitutes a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 117 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC)

15 Firstly the question arises as to whether the Procurement Review Board is to be considered a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty; that is to say, whether the reference is admissible.

16 Both the respondent and the Commission answer this question in the affirmative. With reference to the established case-law of the Court they invoke the statutory footing upon which the Procurement Review Board rests, its permanent character, the contentious nature of proceedings before it, the fact that it applies the law, and its independence. They thus conclude that the Procurement Review Board constitutes a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty.

17 The Procurement Review Board was - according to information which it has itself provided - established by Law No 344 of 6 June 1991. It was set up in implementation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC (7) on the coordination of laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts. Proceedings before the Procurement Review Board are like those in civil disputes. They are adversarial in nature and in nearly all cases an oral hearing takes place. Proceedings are concluded by the Procurement Review Board handing down a decision in the form of an order. Such orders are formulated in the same terms as judgments in civil cases. The Procurement Review Board is not bound by the instructions of any other body and operates as a completely independent institution. The Procurement Review Board is composed of a presiding judge as well as a panel of experts. The rulings of the Procurement Review Board concern the interpretation of Community law in regard to public supply contracts and can thus be said to be of a judicial nature. The Procurement Review Board is also empowered to ascertain the nullity of administrative measures. Furthermore, it also has jurisdiction at last instance in Denmark with regard to the interpretation and application of Community provisions on tendering procedures. The Procurement Review Board therefore concludes that it falls under the term `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty.

18 That conclusion is to be endorsed. The Court has repeatedly held that in order to determine whether a body making a reference is a court or tribunal for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty, which is a question governed by Community law alone, the Court takes account of a number of factors, such as whether the body is established by law, whether it is permanent, whether its jurisdiction is compulsory, whether it applies rules of law, whether its rulings are binding, whether it is independent and whether its procedure is inter partes. (8) Since it fulfils the requirements set out by the Court in its case-law, the Procurement Review Board may be considered a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty. A reference for a preliminary ruling is, at least from that perspective, admissible.

(b) The importance of the questions referred

19 The respondent nevertheless still considers the reference inadmissible on the ground that a ruling on the questions submitted is not indispensable in order for the Procurement Review Board to hand down its decision. An answer would not contribute to resolving the dispute in the main proceedings. The respondent holds that, although it may be within the purview of the national court to decide whether or not a reference pursuant to Article 177 of the Treaty is necessary and indispensable for its ruling, the reference is inadmissible because any answer in the present case would only be of hypothetical value. The respondent further argues that an interpretation of Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 as requested by the Procurement Review Board would not have any impact on the complainants' legal situation. The respondent holds that there is no legal interest worth protecting and that, in reality, questions are concerned that might arise in some later legal dispute. It would, in any event, be of no help to undertakings if the Court were to answer the questions, because in the meantime, a possible procedural error had been cured by the award of the disputed contract. The last tendering procedure which was carried out in 1997/98 had, the respondent argues, taken place in conformity with Directive 93/36 (supply contracts). Thus the complainants could only claim damages, a matter for which the Procurement Review Board does not have jurisdiction and which was not the subject-matter of the initial proceedings.

20 Article 177 of the Treaty provides that it is up to the national court to decide whether a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice is necessary. Article 177 does not provide that the Court may reject such a reference. The Court has thus consistently held that it is solely for the national courts before which actions are brought, and which must bear the responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine, in the light of the special features of each case, both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable them to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which they submit to the Court. (9) One factor particularly in favour of this solution is the fact that it is solely the national court which has direct and exact knowledge of the facts and is in the best position to decide the issue. Where the questions referred by a national court concern the interpretation of Community law, the Court of Justice is, as a rule, required to hand down a ruling.

21 The Court has, however, occasionally allowed exceptions to that rule and refused to rule upon some or all of the questions referred to it. Such cases are, on the one hand, where the national court has not provided the Court of Justice with enough information for the latter to be able to hand down a ruling that might be of some use to the former in the main dispute. On the other hand, the Court has, on a number of occasions, refused to answer the questions referred to it where it was obvious that they bore no relation to the main dispute. Also worth mentioning are those cases where the Court of Justice has rejected a reference for a preliminary ruling because it was of the opinion that the national court had made improper use of the procedure set out in Article 177 of the Treaty. In cases such as these the Court held the view that the questions referred to it were of a general or hypothetical nature.

22 The Ministry's line of argument refers to those last two categories.

23 The order for reference nevertheless shows that the Procurement Review Board considered itself obliged to submit a reference for a preliminary ruling due to the assertions made by the complainants. The Procurement Review Board considers it a possibility that the tendering procedure could have been subject to procedural errors which would invalidate it. If the provisions mentioned by the Procurement Review Board were found to provide that a tendering procedure pursuant to Directive 93/36 should have been carried out, then the Procurement Review Board would most certainly be required to declare the procedure which had already taken place null and void. However, because it is unsure as to the interpretation of Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 in particular, the Procurement Review Board has referred two questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

24 Thus it may be ascertained that the Procurement Review Board considered the referral of these two questions as necessary in order for it to be able to rule on the matter in dispute. Contrary to the view held by the respondent, the order for reference does not allow one to conclude that hypothetical questions are involved here that could only be of relevance in an eventual, future dispute. Because the referring Procurement Review Board has affirmed and justified the relevance of the questions referred to the Court, the reference for a preliminary ruling is admissible.

2. The first question

25 In its first question the Procurement Review Board asks whether Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 (supply contracts) has an independent meaning. In its opinion this question could be answered in the negative. In this vein it argues that this provision was taken over from Article 2(3) of Directive 77/62 and could, under certain circumstances, be understood in connection with the fact that, at the time of its adoption, no Community-wide rules existed as to awarding public service contracts. The contested provision could thus have lost its meaning when Directive 92/50 (service contracts) was adopted. However, the Procurement Review Board holds the view that the fact that the contested provision was maintained when adopting Directive 93/36 could, on the other hand, speak in favour of its having an independent meaning.

26 The respondent, which expresses its opinion on the questions referred to the Court only in the alternative, also affirms the independent character of Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36. It holds that comparisons with the original Directive 77/62 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public supply contracts demonstrate that this provision has constantly been retained despite several amendments. The respondent further holds that an analysis of the preparatory documents and drafts of Directive 93/36 does not reveal that Article 2(2) was to have lost any of its independent character upon the adoption of Directive 92/50. The respondent argues that this provision is not only to be understood in terms of `reminiscing about old times'.

27 In its submission the Commission begins by stating that, on the basis of the facts as presented by the Procurement Review Board, both Directive 93/36 (supply contracts) and Directive 92/50 (service contracts) could be applicable. According to the Commission the preparatory documents and drafts of Directive 93/36 show that this Directive was not meant fundamentally to change the previous Directive. Its adoption was necessary particularly in order to carry out amendments to Directive 92/50, which were also introduced in Directive 93/37/EEC. (10) That did not however affect Article 2(2). Despite those modifications, it is still to be found in Directive 93/36 and guarantees the principle of non-discrimination, even where Directive 92/50 is not applicable. This would particularly be so in cases involving concession contracts. One must thus, in the Commission's opinion, assume that Article 2(2) has its own independent meaning.

28 I essentially concur with the comments made by the respondent and the Commission. The provision contained in Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 is to be found in a similar wording as early as in Directive 77/62, which was the first Directive on the coordination of procedures for the award of public supply contracts to be adopted. The contested provision is still to be found in Article 2(3) of Directive 77/62. The only amendment this provision has been subject to over the years merely concerns the definition of what constitutes a contracting authority. In its essence, the provision has none the less remained unchanged. Thus, pursuant to both provisions, the legal instrument by which a contracting authority grants special rights to a body other than a contracting authority must stipulate that the body in question is to observe the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of nationality when awarding public supply contracts. It may be true that Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 (service contracts) contains a non-discrimination clause; however this clause only provides that contracting authorities must ensure `that there is no discrimination between different service providers'. As can be deduced from its title, this Directive is, however, applicable particularly to public service contracts, whereas Directive 93/36 governs the procedures applicable for the award of public supply contracts.

29 It is nevertheless quite conceivable that cases might exist where, in addition to Directive 93/36 (supply contracts), Directive 92/50 (service contracts) could be applicable. That could apply in particular where a contract that is to be awarded contains service as well as supply components. Should, however, the contract's emphasis be on the supply of goods, then Directive 92/50 would no longer be applicable in such a case. The ban on discrimination contained in Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 would not apply. It is, however, in such a case that the independent meaning of Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 becomes apparent. Another type of case is, however, conceivable, in which, although the award of public service contracts is involved, these could be awarded within the framework of a concession contract. Here also Directive 92/50 and the ban on discrimination contained therein would not be applicable; however such a case would still fall under the scope of Directive 93/36. Under circumstances such as these, the ban on discrimination contained in Article 2(2) would again apply.

30 Due to the fact, however, that neither the preparatory documents nor the various drafts of Directive 93/36 indicate that the provision contained in Article 2(2) was to be deprived of an independent meaning, one must assume that this provision is meant to remain in force alongside Directive 92/50.

3. The second question

31 In its second question, the Procurement Review Board requests an interpretation of Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 in the event that it should have an independent meaning. It enquires in particular as to the content of that provision and whether, first, a contracting authority must, when granting special rights to a private undertaking which is not a contracting authority, require that private undertaking to observe the principle of non-discrimination, and, second, whether Article 2(2) provides that the said private undertaking must apply the procedure for the award of public contracts.

32 The respondent is of the opinion that a contract granting special rights must contain the non-discrimination provision contained in Article 2(2). This would ensure the application of the principle of non-discrimination even where a tendering procedure pursuant to the directive was not required. That would make it clear that individuals are also required to comply with the principle of non-discrimination within the framework of tendering procedures. The respondent further argues that Article 2(2) nevertheless does not require an undertaking which has been granted special rights to carry out a public tendering procedure without fail.

33 According to the Commission, Article 2(2) requires a contracting authority which grants special rights to a body to inform that body of the existence of the prohibition against discrimination and ensure that it is complied with. An additional requirement for that body to carry out a tendering procedure is, in the Commission's view, not contained in Article 2(2).

34 The first point I would make is that the provision in Directive 93/36 concerning tendering procedures is not applicable in the matter at issue here, in so far as Danske Slagterier are concerned. Nevertheless it is true that the threshold value contained in Article 5 of Directive 93/36 has been exceeded, so that, from the point of view of contract volumes, it would normally be applicable. However Danske Slagterier do not constitute a contracting authority. Nor are the eartags in question sold on behalf of, or for the benefit of, the Danish authorities. No financial ties exist in this context between the eartag suppliers and the authorities. Consequently, in so far as the tendering procedure for the award of public supply contracts is concerned, the directive is not applicable in a case such as this.

35 However in order to guarantee the application, beyond the Directive's actual scope, of the prohibition against discrimination so central to Community law, Article 2(2) requires that a contracting authority enforce this prohibition when granting special rights to other bodies. Article 2(2) does not, however, contain a broader obligation to observe the procedural provisions in respect of the award of public contracts. Nor does a comparison with the other two directives on the award of public contracts allow one to read more into the contested provision. Both Directive 93/37 and Directive 92/50 (merely) require the Member States to introduce the necessary measures in order to ensure that contracting authorities respect the provisions contained in these directives. This also includes any prohibition against discrimination contained in the directives.

36 In the present case, the wording alone of Article 2(2) demonstrates that the contracting authority is only required, when granting special rights to a body, to ensure that the prohibition against discrimination is not breached. This is intended to avoid unequal treatment on the basis of nationality in cases involving numerous tenderers. The directive's purpose is to achieve the free movement of goods in the area of public supply contracts which are awarded in the Member States at the expense of the State, local or regional authorities, and other public bodies. It is to that end that the directive makes the award of public supply contracts by contracting authorities subject to a special procedure. The individual procedural conditions are set out in the individual provisions of the Directives. On its own, however, Article 2(2) does not provide that bodies which have been granted special rights, but which do not constitute contracting authorities, must carry out a procedure for the award of public supply contracts as laid out in Directive 93/36, but rather that they must merely observe the principle of non-discrimination on the ground of nationality.

37 Thus it may be concluded that Article 2(2) of Directive 93/36 only places an obligation on the contracting authority, when granting special rights to a body, to ensure compliance with the prohibition against discrimination.

D - Conclusion

38 In light of the foregoing considerations, I suggest the following answers to the questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

(1) Article 2(2) of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts has retained its independent meaning, regardless of the entry into force of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts.

(2) Where a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 93/36/EEC grants special or exclusive rights to carry out public service activities to a body which is not a contracting authority, regardless of its legal status, then the legal instrument granting those rights shall provide that that body, when awarding public service contracts to third parties, must comply with the principle of non-discrimination on the basis of nationality. Article 2(2) does not place any further obligation on the contracting authority to ensure that that body, which is not a contracting authority, applies the procedure for awarding public supply contracts.

(2) - Article 1(b) of Directive 93/36 provides:

`For the purpose of this Directive:... "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

"a body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law;

...'.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 14 March 2000.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Public works contracts - Directives 71/305/EEC, as amended by Directive 89/440/EEC, and 93/37/EEC - Construction and maintenance of school buildings by the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region and the Département du Nord.
Case C-225/98.

I - Introduction

1 In the present infringement proceedings the Commission alleges that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 49 EC) as well as under Directive 71/305/EEC, as amended by Directive 89/440/EEC, in particular Articles 12, 26 and 29 thereof, and under Directive 93/37/EEC, in particular Articles 8, 11, 22 and 30 thereof, concerning the award of public works contracts, in that it failed duly to carry out various procedures for the award of public works contracts for the construction and maintenance of school buildings conducted by the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region and the Département du Nord. The Commission objects specifically to infringements of the advertising rules - in particular those concerning prior information notices and the number of tenderers - and complains of the use of an inadmissible criterion for the award of contracts. It further objects to discriminatory technical specifications used to describe lots and discriminatory proof of professional experience and capability and also complains of a lack of information on the award of contracts and a failure to communicate the written reports.

II - Legal background

A - Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, (1) as amended by Council Directive 89/440/EEC of 18 July 1989, (2) and Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (3)

2 The provisions of Directive 71/305, which had been amended substantially and on a number of occasions, were consolidated by Directive 93/37 `for reasons of clarity and better understanding', according to the first recital in the preamble thereto. Apart from a number of changes in wording, the provisions of Directive 71/305 which are of relevance to the present case are identical to those of Directive 93/37. Since Directive 93/37 did not enter into force until 14 June 1993, but the Commission objects to certain infringements which were committed in part before that time, both directives apply in this case. Moreover, Article 36 of Directive 93/37, by which Directive 71/305 is repealed, states that references to the repealed Directive are to be construed as references to the new Directive.

The articles cited below without reference to a specific directive are those of Directive 93/37.

(a) Award procedure

3 Article 8 - which corresponds to Article 5a of Directive 71/305 - states:

3. For each contract awarded, the contracting authorities shall draw up a written report which shall include at least the following:

- the name and address of the contracting authority, the subject and value of the contract,

- the names of the candidates or tenderers admitted and the reasons for their selection,

- the names of the candidates or tenderers rejected and the reasons for their rejection,

- the name of the successful tenderer and the reasons for his tender having been selected and, if

known, any share of the contract the successful tenderer may intend to subcontract to a third party,

- for negotiated procedures, the circumstances referred to in Article 7 which justify the use of these procedures.

This report, or the main features of it, shall be communicated to the Commission at its request.'

(b) Prior and subsequent information

4 Article 11 - which corresponds to Article 12 of Directive 71/305 - states:

`1. Contracting authorities shall make known, by means of an indicative notice, the essential characteristics of the works contracts which they intend to award and the estimated value of which is not less than the threshold laid down in Article 6(1). (4)

5. Contracting authorities who have awarded a contract shall make known the result by means of a notice....

...

7. The contracting authorities shall send the notices referred to in paragraphs 1 to 5 as rapidly as possible and by the most appropriate channels to the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities....

...'

(c) Effect of the prior information notice on the time-limit for submitting tenders

5 Article 12 - which corresponds to Article 13 of Directive 71/305 - states:

`1. In open procedures the time-limit for the receipt of tenders fixed by the contracting authorities shall be not less than 52 days from the date of dispatch of the notice.

2. The time-limit for the receipt of tenders laid down in paragraph 1 may be reduced to 36 days where the contracting authorities have published the notice [provided] for in Article 11(1), drafted in accordance with the specimen in Annex IV A, in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

6 Article 13 - which corresponds to Article 14 of Directive 71/305 - provides as follows:

3. In restricted procedures, the time-limit for receipt of tenders fixed by the contracting authorities may not be less than 40 days from the date of dispatch of the written invitation.

4. The time-limit for the receipt of tenders laid down in paragraph 3 may be reduced to 26 days where the contracting authorities have published the notice provided for in Article 11(1), drafted in accordance with the model in Annex IV A, in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

...'

(d) Number of tenderers

7 Article 22 - which corresponds to Article 22 of Directive 71/305, as amended by Directive 89/440 - provides that:

`...

2. Where the contracting authorities award a contract by restricted procedure, they may prescribe the range within which the number of undertakings which they intend to invite will fall. In this case the range shall be indicated in the contract notice. The range shall be determined in the light of the [nature] of the work to be carried out. ... The range must number at least 5 undertakings and may be up to 20.

In any event, the number of candidates invited to tender shall be sufficient to ensure genuine competition.

(e) Evidence of capability

8 Article 27 - which corresponds to Article 26 of Directive 71/305 - states:

`1. Evidence of the contractor's technical capability may be furnished by:

(a) the contractor's educational and professional qualifications and/or those of the firm's managerial staff and, in particular, those of the person or persons responsible for carrying out the works;

(b) a list of the works carried out over the past five years, accompanied by certificates of satisfactory execution for the most important works. These certificates shall indicate the value, date and site of the works and shall specify whether they were carried out according to the rules of the trade and properly completed. Where necessary, the competent authority shall submit these certificates to the contracting authority direct;

(c) a statement of the tools, plant and technical equipment available to the contractor for carrying out the work;

(d) a statement of the firm's average annual manpower and the number of managerial staff for the last three years;

(e) a statement of the technicians or technical bodies which the contractor can call upon for carrying out the work, whether or not they belong to the firm.

2. The contracting authorities shall specify [in the notice or] in the invitation to tender which of these references are to be produced.'

(f) Criteria for the award of contracts

9 Article 30 - which corresponds to Article 29 of Directive 71/305 - provides as follows:

`1. The criteria on which the contracting authorities shall base the award of contracts shall be:

(a) either the lowest price only;

(b) or, when the award is made to the most economically advantageous tender, various criteria according to the contract: e. g. price, period for completion, running costs, profitability, technical merit.

2. In the case referred to in paragraph 1(b), the contracting authority shall state in the contract documents or in the contract notice all the criteria it intends to apply to the award, where possible in descending order of importance.

III - Pre-litigation procedure and facts

10 The subject-matter of the present infringement proceedings is the result of two separate pre-litigation procedures.

11 In the first case, at the beginning of 1993, an unsuccessful tenderer drew the Commission's attention to the tendering procedure for a public works contract issued by open procedure. That procedure related to the construction of a multipurpose secondary school in Wingles (Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region). The contract notice was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities of 21 January 1993. The Commission had a number of criticisms of that contract notice. In a formal letter of notice of 27 September 1993, it alleged that the French authorities had set too short a time-limit for the receipt of tenders, that the classification of the lots by reference only to technical specifications used in France was inadequate, and that it was unlawful to require evidence of the contractors' technical capability by means of certificates which were used only in France and to refer to a national law in respect of the award criteria. Finally, the Commission complained about the refusal of the French authorities to communicate to it the records of the contested procedure. In the view of the Commission, the French authorities' reply of 20 December 1993 was not satisfactory. Consequently, on 8 September 1995, it sent a reasoned opinion to the French Republic. That letter went unanswered.

12 In the second case, meanwhile, the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region published 14 contract notices in the Official Journal of 18 February 1995 as part of the `Plan Lycées' programme. The aggregate value of the contracts amounted to approximately FRF 1.4 thousand million. It was a restricted procedure relating to modernisation and maintenance works over a period of 10 years. The notices set out the award criteria. In that respect an `additional criterion' relating to the promotion of employment was laid down. That was based on a ministerial circular of 29 December 1993.

13 By letter of 21 November 1995, the Commission gave the French authorities formal notice to submit their observations on certain complaints about the calls for tenders relating to, for example, the failure to publish a prior information notice, the use of the additional award criterion relating to the promotion of employment, the failure to admit an adequate number of potential tenderers and the use of qualification criteria having discriminatory effect.

14 The Commission investigated the award procedure practised by the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region and the Département du Nord over a period of three years. On 8 May 1996, it sent a supplementary letter of formal notice to the French authorities. They replied by letter of 9 August 1996 stating that they intended to improve the award procedures in respect of new contracts.

15 On 7 April 1997, the Commission sent a reasoned opinion summarising the complaints, to which the French authorities did not reply. On 18 June 1998, the Commission thus brought the present action which was registered at the Court of Justice on 22 June 1998.

16 The Commission claims that the Court should:

- declare that, in the course of the various procedures for the award of public works contracts for the construction and maintenance of school buildings by the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region and the Département du Nord over a period of three years, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 49 EC) as well as under Directive 71/305/EEC, as amended by Directive 89/440/EEC, in particular Articles 12, 26 and 29 thereof, and under Directive 93/37/EEC, in particular under Articles under 8, 11, 22 and 30 thereof.

In the reply it further claims that the Court should:

- order the French Republic to pay the costs.

17 The French Republic contends that the Court should dismiss the action.

18 I will return to the arguments of the parties and the further details of the case in my consideration of the individual complaints.

19 The same applies to the questions which the Court of Justice referred to the Commission as regards the legal consequences of a failure to publish a prior information notice and the practice of the contracting authorities in the Community in publishing prior information notices, and in respect of the French Government's observations on the Commission's replies.

IV - The individual complaints

20 The Commission bases its action on several complaints which can be grouped as follows. The order corresponds to that used in the application.

A - Infringement of Article 12 of Directive 71/305 or Article 11 of Directive 93/37 by failing to observe the prior information procedure (see points 4 to 6 above for the wording of the article)

Arguments of the parties

21 The Commission considers that the French authorities infringed Article 12 of Directive 71/305 or Article 11 of Directive 93/37 in that they only rarely adhered to the prior information procedure. It follows from those articles that the prior information procedure constitutes a compulsory preliminary for any tendering procedure to be organised pursuant to the Directive. In essence, the French authorities have not denied that allegation.

22 However, on 18 February 1995, the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region published 14 contract notices without having recourse to a preliminary prior information procedure within the meaning of the provision. Furthermore, the prior information procedure was only rarely followed between 1993 and 1995. As regards the Département du Nord, no prior information notices were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities during the period under investigation. A prior information notice was published only in respect of Wingles secondary school and a training centre for apprentices.

23 The French Government does not deny that Article 11(1) of the Directive imposes an obligation. However, it claims that the duty to publish prior information notices must be qualified in the light of Articles 12 and 13 of that directive. Articles 12(1) and 13(3) of the Directive provide that the time-limit for the receipt of tenders is, in principle, 52 or 40 days. The contracting authority may, under Articles 12(2) and 13(4), reduce that time-limit where it has published in the Official Journal of the European Communities the notice provided for in Article 11(1). According to the French Government, if the publication of a prior information notice were always compulsory, the precondition for reducing the time-limit would be satisfied in every award procedure. As a result, Article 11 is incompatible with Articles 12 and 13. Consequently, several interpretations are possible depending on whether the prior information procedure is regarded as compulsory, in accordance with Article 11(1), or as optional, in accordance with Articles 12 and 13. The French authorities have opted for the second interpretation. Furthermore, the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region republished the contract notices in question, this time complying with the prior information requirement.

24 The Commission considers that the French authorities' argument that the prior information procedure is optional is incorrect. It is irrelevant that the contracting authorities did not intend to benefit from the reductions in the time- limit for the receipt of tenders provided for in Articles 12 and 13.

25 Since the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region responded to the Commission's criticisms in the formal notice within the period laid down in the reasoned opinion - albeit without informing the Commission thereof - the action could have become inadmissible on that point.

26 The aim of infringement proceedings is to establish whether the State concerned has failed to fulfil its obligations and has not rectified that failure within the time-limit laid down in the reasoned opinion. As the Court of Justice has consistently held, in infringement proceedings the question whether a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations must be determined by reference to the situation in the Member State as it stood at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. By that time the French authorities had retrospectively published prior information notices in so far as that was still possible. Thus, the French authorities complied with the Commission's demands within the time-limit laid down in the reasoned opinion. An essential precondition for the admissibility of the action for failure to fulfil obligations is therefore not satisfied.

27 However, in the proceedings before the Court of Justice, the French Government contended that the prior information notice provided for in Article 11 of the Directive is not compulsory. To that extent it did not acknowledge, as a matter of fact, the alleged failure to fulfil its obligations. Therefore, there continues to be an interest in ruling on the disparity in the interpretation of Article 11, read in conjunction with Articles 12 and 13, and consequently the action is admissible in that respect. Furthermore, the changes were not communicated to the Commission.

28 In the context of a substantive analysis, the parties agree that Article 11(1), viewed in isolation, requires a contracting authority to publish beforehand the essential characteristics of works contracts. However, it is uncertain whether that interpretation must be qualified in the light of Articles 12(2) and 13(4). The expression `where the contracting authorities have published the notice' contained in Articles 12(2) and 13(4) may indicate that it does. However, the opposite is indicated firstly by the fact that Article 11, on the one hand, and Articles 12 and 13, on the other, govern two fundamentally different matters. Article 11 requires a contracting authority to make known its works contracts, whereas Articles 12 and 13 lay down the time-limits for the receipt of tenders. It would be contrary to the system to conclude that Articles 12(2) and 13(4) were intended, in addition, to lay down rules on the publication of prior information notices even though those rules had already been laid down in unequivocal terms.

29 Moreover, the spirit and purpose of the Directive indicate that there is a general duty to publish prior information notices. The aim of the Directive is to create effective competition in the field of public contracts. Therefore, it is necessary for an unlimited range of tenderers from all the Member States to have an opportunity to obtain timely and comprehensive information on forthcoming award procedures. However, that necessary broad effect is not achieved if a contracting authority is able to decide about publication - even if only a prior information notice is involved.

30 The French Government's argument that that interpretation regularly results in the time-limits' being reduced from 52 to 36 or from 37 to 26 days respectively cannot be accepted. Even though there is a general duty to publish a prior information notice, the rules in Articles 12(1) and (2) and 13(1) and (4) are not deprived of their purpose. The time-limit may be reduced only where a prior information notice has been duly published. Consequently, the facility to reduce the time-limit is merely an optional provision which the contracting authority need not invoke. The different time-limits are an exception which, where it consists of a reduction in time-limits, is subject to a condition in the form of the due publication of a prior information notice.

31 It may indeed be concluded from the statement that time-limits may be reduced only where a prior information notice has been published that, in spite of the general duty to publish such notices, it is possible to conceive of cases where such publication has not taken place. Furthermore, at the hearing the Commission pointed out that it is not always possible to publish a prior information notice for objective reasons. For example, budgetary reasons might be responsible for a prior information notice's not being published in due time where the award of contracts is subject to existing funds whose availability may vary at different times.

32 At the hearing the Commission pointed out that that problem was identified when Article 12 of Directive 71/305 was amended. At the time it was proposed that a qualification along the lines of `except where that is not possible' be incorporated into the text of the legislation. However, neither that nor any similar expression was incorporated into the text of the Directive.

33 Therefore, as a rule, a prior information notice is compulsory. Where no such prior information notice is published, the contracting authority must be in a position to state the reasons why that is so. Compliance with the longer time-limit for the receipt of tenders is then an inevitable consequence of the failure to publish a prior information notice. However, there is no automatic effect in the sense that where longer time-limits, which are the norm, are set, there is no need to publish a prior information notice provided for in Article 11 of the Directive, but the opposite does apply, that is to say that a time-limit may be reduced exceptionally only after a prior information notice has been published.

34 The first complaint is consequently admissible and founded.

B - Infringement of Article 30 of Directive 93/97 - which corresponds to Article 29 of Directive 71/305 - by using an inadmissible award criterion (see point 9 above for the wording of the article)

35 As is evidenced by the annexes attached to the documents before the Court, in their contract notices the French contracting authorities specifically referred at several junctures in the section entitled `Criteria for award of contracts' to the employment criterion as an `additional criterion' over and above the price, time-limit for completion, and so on.

Arguments of the parties

36 The Commission considers that the French Republic has infringed Article 30 by making the promotion of employment an award criterion. In the view of the Commission, that aspect can be used only as a condition of performance. In that respect the Commission relies on the judgment of the Court of Justice in Beentjes. (5)

37 The Commission points out that in the present case the additional criterion relating to the promotion of employment is based on a ministerial circular of 29 December 1993. In accordance therewith, it is possible to take local measures to combat unemployment and promote employment in connection with the award of public contracts.

38 However, Article 30 of Directive 93/37 provides for only two possible award criteria, firstly, the criterion of the lowest price and, secondly, the most economically advantageous tender. Consequently, the French authorities infringed Article 30 in that they specifically took account of the employment criterion when they adopted their decision on the award of contracts.

39 The French Government, on the other hand, considers that Beentjes specifically allows an additional award criterion. In that respect it cites paragraphs 28 and 37(iii) of the judgment which read as follows:

`As regards the exclusion of a tenderer on the ground that it is not in a position to employ long-term unemployed persons, it should be noted in the first place that such a condition has no relation to the checking of contractors' suitability... or to the criteria for the award of contracts referred to in Article 29 of the Directive.'

`[T]he condition relating to the employment of long-term unemployed persons is compatible with the Directive if it has no direct or indirect discriminatory effect on tenderers from other Member States of the Community. An additional specific condition of this kind must be mentioned in the contract notice.'

40 However, the French Government argues that whereas, according to Beentjes, the employment criterion must be referred to expressly in the contract notice, there is no evidence to support that in the model contract notices in Annex IV to Directive 93/37. They contain no heading relating to such indications. (6)

41 Moreover, even if the employment criterion were regarded as a performance criterion, it would be on the basis of national legislation, not the Directive. In that case Article 30 of the Directive would not be relevant and the Commission's allegation would be incorrect. Finally, the French Government points out that it instructed the contracting authorities to act in accordance with the circular of 29 December 1993. The circular states quite clearly that the additional criterion relating to employment must not be treated in the same way as the criteria referred to specifically in Article 30 of the Directive. Instead, it is a secondary criterion for the award of contracts.

42 However, even if the Court concurs with the Commission's view, the French Government considers that its actions comply with the Directive also in that respect.

Analysis

43 In Beentjes the Court ruled that an employment criterion (in that case a condition relating to the employment of long-term unemployed persons) had no relation to the criteria for the award of contracts referred to in Article 29 of Directive 71/305. (7)

44 Therefore, it is necessary to clarify whether criteria relating to the promotion of employment are precluded not only as award criteria for the purpose of Article 30(1)(b) of Directive 93/37, but also as secondary criteria.

45 In the view of the French Government employment is admissible as a secondary criterion where several tenders of equal value have been submitted. However, in such cases that would result in the employment criterion ultimately being granted the status of the sole, decisive award criterion, a possibility which is specifically ruled out in the light of Beentjes. The employment criterion does not serve directly to determine the most economically advantageous tender. Otherwise, in certain circumstances, it would have even greater importance than the criteria referred to in Article 30(1)(b) of the Directive, since the employment aspect alone could be decisive.

46 Article 30 of the Directive has been infringed in so far as the French authorities made the employment criterion an additional award criterion. Consequently, it is irrelevant whether the employment criterion is laid down at national level by the ministerial circular of 29 December 1993 since Article 30 of the Directive takes precedence.

47 It should be borne in mind that the employment aspect is now probably perceived differently in terms of social policy from when the Directive was adopted: from today's perspective, the Directive focuses more on microeconomic, and less on macroeconomic, factors. However, any change would be for the legislature.

48 The Directive would not be infringed if the requirement to promote employment were expressed as a condition - as in Beentjes - and in that respect assumed the character of a performance criterion, as was stated by the Commission.

49 However, since the French authorities regarded the employment criterion as a separate award criterion, Article 30 of the Directive was infringed.

C - Infringement of Article 22 of Directive 93/37 by limiting the number of candidates selected (see point 7 above for the wording of the article)

50 Where a contracting authority awards a contract by restricted procedure, it may, under Article 22(2) of the Directive, prescribe the range within which the number of undertakings which it intends to invite will fall. The range must number at least five undertakings, as the fourth sentence of Article 22(2) expressly stipulates.

51 Under heading 13 in the contract notice published in the Official Journal of 18 February 1995 the French contracting authorities stated: `Maximum number of candidates which may be invited to submit a tender: 5'.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

Arguments of the parties

52 The Commission takes the view that that indication gives the impression that the number of tenderers might also be less than five. That would constitute an infringement of the fourth sentence of Article 22(2) of the Directive.

53 The French Government does not share that view. It contends that limiting the number of tenderers to five fulfils the preconditions laid down in the fourth sentence of Article 22(2) of the Directive. There is nothing in Article 22 to indicate that the number of tenderers may not be limited to five. Effective competition is ensured. The Commission has been unable to adduce any evidence to the contrary.

Analysis

54 The indication chosen by the French contracting authorities poses problems in two respects. Firstly, Article 22(2) refers to a `range'. No range is clear from the wording of the notice in question. There could be such a range at most if the number five implied a range of one to five, but that would be incompatible with Article 22(2).

55 However, if the indication of five for the number of tenderers to be invited is regarded as an absolute requirement in the sense that at least five tenderers are to be invited, it could be compatible with the requirements of the Directive. However, the French Government interpreted the indication at issue as meaning that `a maximum' of five tenderers may be admitted. It takes the view that effective competition is ensured under those conditions. However, that view is incompatible with the requirements of the Directive which expressly lays down a minimum number of five tenderers. Therefore the objective wording of that indication, in conjunction with the interpretation placed on it in the contract notices, renders it incompatible with Article 22(2) of the Directive.

D - Infringement of Article 29(2) of Directive 71/305 or of Article 30(2) of Directive 93/37 as a result of the method known as award by reference to the legislation of a Member State (see point 9 above for the wording of the article)

Arguments of the parties

56 In its application the Commission also maintains that Article 29(2) of Directive 71/305 and Article 30(2) of Directive 93/37 have been infringed. It claims they have been infringed since, in most of the contract notices, the contracting authorities employed the method known as `award by reference to the Code des Marchés Publics' in order to indicate the award criteria.

57 In support of that view the Commission refers to the case-law of the Court. In paragraph 35 of its judgment in Beentjes the Court held that Article 29(1) and (2) of the Directive requires that the criteria be stated in the contract notice or the contract documents. A general reference to a provision of national legislation cannot satisfy the publicity requirement.

58 However, the French Government claims first of all that the Commission's complaint was made too late and is thus inadmissible. The Commission made that complaint for the first time in the reasoned opinion. As the Court has held, (8) enlargement, in the reasoned opinion, of the scope of the complaint made in the initial letter constitutes an irregularity which cannot be cured.

59 However, in the event that the Court considers that the complaint is admissible, the French Government points out that Article 30(2) of Directive 93/37 does not require the contracting authority to state the award criteria in the contract notice but gives it the choice of including them in the contract documents or in the contract notice. The French Government concludes that the Commission was wrong to make the complaint since the criteria are contained in the contract documents and the national provisions applicable in accordance with the Code des Marchés Publics are largely identical in content to Directive 93/37.

60 As regards the admissibility of the abovementioned complaint, the Commission contends that the letter of formal notice of 8 May 1996 has drawn attention to the problem in a sufficiently precise manner. In that letter the Commission had pointed out that, under the 10th recital in the preamble to Directive 93/37, the information contained in contract notices must enable contractors to determine whether the proposed contracts are of interest to them. For this purpose, it is appropriate to give them adequate information on the works to be undertaken and the conditions attached thereto. Furthermore, in the letter of formal notice the Commission had already referred to the case-law of the Court, in particular Beentjes.

61 Consequently, the action taken is in conformity with the case-law of the Court, as is evident from the judgment in Case 274/83 Commission v Italy. (9) Moreover, at no time have the French authorities allowed the Commission to view the contract documents on which the French Government bases its arguments.

Analysis

62 Firstly, it is necessary to consider whether the Commission's complaint is admissible in the context of the present infringement proceedings. In Case 51/83 Commission v Italy the Court did rule that enlargement, in the reasoned opinion, of the scope of the complaint made in the initial letter constitutes an irregularity which cannot be cured. (10) The action should therefore be dismissed as inadmissible to the extent that it goes beyond the complaints made in the letter of formal notice. However, in Case 274/83 Commission v Italy the Court of Justice subsequently clarified its case-law to the effect that the Commission may set out in detail in the reasoned opinion the complaints which it has already made more generally in its initial letter. (11)

63 In the present case the Commission initially complained generally in the letter of formal notice about the contract notices in question. It also made specific complaints. It commented on the award criteria. It pointed out that the notices must enable contractors to determine whether the proposed contracts are of interest to them. That requires the provision of adequate information. Furthermore, the Commission referred to the case-law of the Court, in particular Beentjes, in which the Court ruled specifically on the criteria for the award of contracts. The Commission's subsequent criticism in the reasoned opinion of the award criteria constitutes a lawful clarification of the complaints raised in the letter of formal notice. Since the Commission made no fundamentally new complaints, the complaint about the method of award by reference to the legislation of a Member State does not constitute an inadmissible enlargement of the scope of the complaints. On the contrary, the Commission narrowed down its complaint. It thus enabled the French authorities to rectify the irregularity in the award procedure. In doing so the Commission took adequate account of the spirit and purpose of the pre-litigation stage of infringement proceedings. The subject-matter of the dispute was set out in the letter of formal notice in such a way that the French authorities could have taken action.

64 Consequently, the complaint made by the Commission must be regarded as admissible.

65 The wording of Article 30(2) of Directive 93/37 states that `the contracting authority shall state in the contract documents or in the contract notice all the criteria it intends to apply to the award'. (12) In addition, in Beentjes the Court expressly held in respect of the award criteria that a general reference to a provision of national legislation cannot satisfy the publicity requirement. (13) Therefore, the possibility can be ruled out that certain award criteria can be laid down in national legislation to which the contract notice refers.

66 The French Government's objection that the national rules laid down in the Code des Marchés Publics are frequently identical in content to the rules in Directive 93/37 is irrelevant. The publicity principle is infringed by the general reference and cannot be remedied by the fact that the national legislation displays similarities to the Directive since a potential tenderer is unable to detect possible substantive similarities from the contract notice.

67 Consequently, it must be found that the complaint relating to the inadmissible reference to the legislation of a Member State in order to fix the award criteria is admissible and well founded.

E - Infringement of Article 59 of the Treaty by using discriminatory technical specifications in the mode of designating the lots and the evidence requested as to the undertakings' capability

Arguments of the parties

68 In its application the Commission claims that the French Government infringed the provisions on the freedom to provide services contained in Article 59 of the Treaty. When the contracting authorities designate the lots they use the same technical specifications in respect of the requirements on tenderers as those used by French professional organisations. For example, the notices refer to qualifications such as `Mandataire EFF6 CA11...'. The Commission considers that the technical specifications adopted by the contracting authorities might result in French undertakings being favoured. They are familiar with that system of quality certification and are accustomed to submitting documents or services in accordance with the references required in the contract notice. Undertakings established in other Member States, on the other hand, might be deterred from submitting tenders. They have no means of determining beforehand whether their qualifications comply with the technical specifications in the absence of any reference to equivalent qualifications. The fact that the French authorities merely wish that those technical qualifications were in conformity with those national references does not alter that assessment in any way.

69 The French Government, on the other hand, takes the view that the technical specifications of the French professional organisations adopted by the contracting authorities are merely indications and have no discriminatory effect. It is not a question of specifying, in the notice, information relating to the selection criteria or the criteria for the award of contracts, since that is done in the contract documents. Instead, only indications as to the nature of the lots have to be provided.

70 Furthermore, the French Government points out that the new notices in respect of the award of public works contracts published in January 1996 and January 1997 no longer contain any references to the technical specifications of the French professional organisations.

71 As regards this final objection, the Commission points out that when the time-limit laid down in the reasoned opinion expired there was nothing to indicate that the grounds for the complaint had ceased to exist.

Analysis

72 It is first necessary to consider the admissibility of this complaint. Since the French authorities discontinued use of the contested specifications in contract notices published after the expiry of the time-limit laid down in the reasoned opinion, the infringement could be regarded as remedied and there might be no interest in ruling on the matter.

73 However, in the proceedings before the Court the French Government still claims that the contested specifications are not liable to have a discriminatory effect.

74 Therefore, there is still a need for legal clarification.

75 Furthermore, the present complaint could be inadmissible from a different point of view. In respect of this complaint the Commission relies solely on Article 59 of the Treaty, whereas Article 26 of Directive 71/305 contains specific rules on proof of undertaking's technical capability. Therefore, the question arises as to the extent to which it is possible to have recourse to the primary law provisions of the Treaty where the situation is governed by the Directive.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

76 Article 26 of Directive 71/305 contains a list of the documents which may be used to prove technical capability. It consists of a series of documents which are intended to adduce proof of an undertaking's capabilities. The contracting authority is entitled to choose which of those documents are to be submitted. In the words of the Directive:

`The authorities awarding contracts shall specify in the notice or in the invitation to tender which of these references are to be produced.'

The way in which certain technical capabilities are to be indicated is governed at most indirectly by Article 26 of Directive 71/305 which, moreover, must be interpreted in the light of the Treaty, like any provision of a directive. Therefore, there is certainly scope for Article 59 of the Treaty to be applied to technical specifications having discriminatory effect.

77 In substantive terms it must be concluded that the technical specifications adopted are so specific and abstruse that, as a rule, only French candidates are able to detect their significance immediately. Consequently, it is easier for French undertakings to submit documents or services which comply with the coded references contained in the contract notice. Candidates from other Member States, on the other hand, find it considerably more difficult to submit tenders within the brief period prescribed since they must first obtain information from the contracting authority on the relevant specifications and qualifications. That may involve considerably more work and expenditure than for French competitors. The French authorities failed to set out the basic requirements in a clear and generally intelligible form or with reference to Community rules. Consequently, the contested designation of the lots constitutes covert discrimination.

78 In that context the French Government's objection that the technical specifications adopted are merely indications, even though in practice only French candidates are able to understand the specifications without outside help, is irrelevant. To candidates from other Member States they are not indications, but a dissuasive description of the necessary preconditions for qualification. If the contracting authorities wish merely to provide indications, they can do so in a non-discriminatory manner.

79 It must be noted that the Commission's complaint that the French Government has infringed Article 59 of the Treaty is, in substantive terms, well founded.

F - Infringement of Article 59 of the Treaty by requiring registration with the French Ordre des Architectes as one of the `minimum standards for participation'

80 The Commission contends that the Département du Nord has also failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 59 of the Treaty in that it imposed in a certain number of notices restrictions on the freedom of Community architects to provide services, for example by requiring proof of registration with the French Ordre des Architectes.

81 The French Government does not dispute the Commission's claim. It simply refers to the contracting authorities' inexperience in applying Community law in relation to the award of public contracts.

82 There is no need to consider this complaint in substantive terms since it has been expressly accepted by the French Government. The French authorities have infringed Article 59 of the Treaty in that they unlawfully restricted the freedom of architects from other Member States to provide services. That infringement of Community law cannot be justified by the inexperience of the contracting authorities. The Commission's application must be allowed also in respect of this complaint.

G - Further complaints in respect of the failure to communicate the written reports to the Commission as provided for in Article 8(3) of Directive 93/37 and failure to provide subsequent information on contract awards as provided for in Article 11(5) of Directive 93/37 (see points 3 and 4 above for the wording of the articles)

83 The French Government does not in principle dispute the Commission's other complaints regarding the failure to provide the necessary information after the contracts were awarded and gives the reason for them as inexperience on the part of the contracting authorities. Since it expressly accepts these complaints, the failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty can be determined without further substantive consideration.

V - Costs

84 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the defendant has been unsuccessful it must pay the costs.

VI - Conclusion

85 In the light of the foregoing I propose that the Court should:

(1) Declare that, in the course of the various procedures for the award of public works contracts for the construction and maintenance of school buildings conducted by the Nord-Pas-de-Calais Region and the Département du Nord over a period of three years, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Article 49 EC) as well as under Directive 71/305/EEC, as amended by Directive 89/440/EEC, in particular Articles 12, 26 and 29 thereof, and under Directive 93/37/EEC, in particular Articles 8, 11, 22 and 30 thereof;

(2) Order the French Republic to pay the costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 23 September 1999.
Holst Italia SpA v Comune di Cagliari, intervener: Ruhrwasser AG International Water Management.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale per la Sardegna - Italy.
Directive 92/50/EEC - Public service contracts - Proof of standing of the service provider - Possibility of relying on the standing of another company.
Case C-176/98.

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the right of a company which participates in a tender procedure, in accordance with Directive 92/50/EEC (1) of 18 June 1992 on the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (hereinafter `the Directive'), to rely on the technical and financial qualifications of another company, to which the first-mentioned company is linked as a subsidiary to the parent company.

I - The Community legislation

2 Under Article 3(1) of the Directive, in awarding public service contracts contracting authorities are to apply procedures adapted to the provisions of the directive.

3 Article 26 of the Directive provides:

`1. Tenders may be submitted by groups of service providers. These groups may not be required to assume a specific legal form in order to submit the tender; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract.

2. Candidates or tenderers who, under the law of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to carry out the relevant service activity, shall not be rejected solely on the grounds that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would have been required to be either natural or legal persons.

3. Legal persons may be required to indicate in the tender or request for participation the names and relevant professional qualifications of the staff to be responsible for the performance of the service.'

4 Article 31 of the Directive provides:

`1. Proof of the service provider's financial and economic standing may, as a general rule, be furnished by one or more of the following references:

(a) appropriate statements from banks or evidence of relevant professional risk indemnity insurance;

(b) the presentation of the service provider's balance sheets or extracts therefrom, where publication of the balance sheets is required under company law in the country in which the service provider is established;

(c) a statement of the undertaking's overall turnover and its turnover in respect of the service to which the contract relates for the previous three financial years.

2. The contracting authorities shall specify in the contract notice or in the invitation to tender which reference or references mentioned in paragraph 1 they have chosen and which other references are to be produced.

3. If, for any valid reason, the service provider is unable to provide the reference requested by the contracting authority, he may prove his economic and financial standing by any other document which the contracting authority considers appropriate.'

5 Article 32 of the Directive provides:

`1. The ability of the service providers to perform services may be evaluated in particular with regard to their skills, efficiency, experience and reliability.

2. Evidence of the service provider's technical capability may be furnished by one or more of the following means according to the nature, quantity and purpose of the services to be provided:

(a) the service provider's educational and professional qualifications and/or those of the firm's managerial staff and, in particular, those of the person or persons responsible for providing the service;

(b) a list of the principal services provided in the past three years, with the sums, dates and recipients, public or private, of the services provided;

- where provided to contracting authorities, evidence is to be in the form of certificates issued or countersigned by the competent authority,

- where provided to private purchasers, delivery is to be certified by the purchaser or, failing this, simply declared by the service provider to have been effected;

(c) an indication of the technicians or technical bodies involved, whether or not belonging directly to the service provider, especially those responsible for quality control;

(d) a statement of the service provider's average annual manpower and the number of managerial staff for the last three years;

(e) a statement of the tool, plant or technical equipment available to the service provider for carrying out the services;

(f) a description of the service provider's measures for ensuring quality and his study and research facilities;

(g) where the services to be provided are complex, or, exceptionally, are required for a specific purpose, a check carried out by the contracting authority or on its behalf by a competent official body of the country within which the service provider is established, subject to that body's agreement, on the technical capacities of the service provider and, if necessary, on his study and research facilities and quality control measures;

(h) an indication of the proportion of the contract which the service provider may intend to sub-contract.

3. The contracting authority shall specify, in the notice or in the invitation to tender, which references it wishes to receive.

4. The extent of the information referred to in Article 31 and in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of this Article must be confined to the subject of the contract; contracting authorities shall take into consideration the legitimate interests of the service providers as regards the protection of their technical or trade secrets.'

II - Facts and the main proceedings

6 For the purposes of the award of a three-year contract for the management of the waste water purification plant of `Is Arenas' and the water collection stations situated at `Is Arenas', `San Bartolomeo' and `Borgo Sant'Elia', the Municipality of Cagliari issued an invitation to tender. This was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 3 January 1997. In order to tender, interested undertakings had to provide proof of an average annual turnover of not less than ITL 5 000 million, in the field of management of water purification and sewage disposal plants, and also actual management of at least one domestic water purification plant for a period of two consecutive years during the previous three years.

SpA (Ruhrwasser) were permitted to participate in the call for tenders. By a decision of the contract-awarding committee of 13 June 1997, approved by a decision of the town council on 17 August 1997, the contract was awarded to Ruhrwasser, which provided the most advantageous offer for the contracting authority.

8 Ruhrwasser is a German limited liability company whose share capital is held by a consortium of six German companies, each owning one sixth of the company shares. The object of Ruhrwasser is to enable the consortium to win contracts, particularly abroad, in the field of water supply and waste water purification. One of the companies forming part of the consortium, RWG Ruhr-Wasserwirtschafts-Gesellschaft mbh (RWG), has as its only shareholder Ruhrverband, a public-law body responsible in Germany for public service tasks in the field of the management of waste water. It is established that this body has references which would have been sufficient to qualify it for the call for tenders by the Municipality of Cagliari.

9 It is also established, however, that Ruhrwasser did not directly possess the required qualifications to tender properly, being a newly constituted company which was entered on the register of companies only on 9 July 1996. For this reason, Ruhrwasser relied on the technical and financial qualifications of Ruhrverband which, through its subsidiary RWG, participated in the joint venture from the outset of the creation of Ruhrwasser. The contracting authority accepted the validity of these indirect references.

10 Holst Italia commenced proceedings before the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale (Regional Administrative Court) per la Sardegna (Italy) for annulment of the award of the contract to its competitor, principally on the ground that the contested decision infringed the rule in the invitation to tender according to which only the qualifications of companies interested in the contract could be taken into account to assess their eligibility to participate in the procedure. Ruhrwasser lodged an interlocutory application disputing the content of the invitation to tender, on the ground that it did not permit a service provider to rely on, by any appropriate document, the qualifications which it did not possess directly but which it nevertheless had at its disposal.

III - The question referred for a preliminary ruling

11 Considering that, in order to rule on this point it was necessary to determine whether Directive 92/50 permits a candidate participating in a tender procedure to rely on the technical and financial qualifications of another legal person to which it is linked, the national court stayed proceedings in the main action and referred the following question to the Court:

`Does Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992, relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, permit a company to prove that it possesses the technical and financial qualifications laid down for participation in a procedure for the award of a public service contract by relying on the references of another company, which is the sole shareholder of one of the companies having a holding in the first-mentioned company?'

IV - Answer to the question referred for a preliminary ruling

12 The national court is asking essentially whether an undertaking which submits a tender to secure a public service contract must itself fulfil the technical and financial conditions required by the contracting authority, or whether it may rely indirectly on compliance with those conditions by another company to which it belongs in part.

13 In order to answer the question referred, it is necessary to examine the rules and provisions of Community law, as they are contained in Directive 92/50 and as they have been supplemented by the case-law of the Court.

Aims and relevant provisions of Directive 92/50

14 Directive 92/50 has two main objectives, the free movement of services (2) and free competition

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(3) in this sector. Economic operators should be able to move and supply services without any restriction on the basis of their nationality or their place of residence, thus contributing, by the multiplicity and the comparison of services offered, to the improvement in the quality of services offered and the economic conditions under which they are performed in the Community.

15 In order to establish an internal market comprising an area without internal frontiers within which the free movement of services is ensured, (4) Directive 92/50 lays down rules designed to remove obstacles to this freedom. (5)

16 According to Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50: `Contracting authorities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.' It is necessary to determine whether the non-admission of a tenderer on the ground that he does not personally fulfil the technical and financial capacity conditions set by the contracting authority constitutes such discrimination.

17 Directive 92/50 cites a certain number of criteria which could identify discriminatory conduct. It states that `... services providers may be either natural or legal persons', (6) which suggests that the legal form of undertakings should not constitute an obstacle to their freedom to tender. This factor is referred to in Article 26(2), which prohibits the rejection of a tender on the sole ground that it was submitted by a natural person or by a legal person.

18 The requirement for a specific legal structure in order for a contract to be awarded could therefore be perceived as an unjustified restriction on the right of economic operators to compete under the same conditions.

19 Article 26(1) of Directive 92/50 confirms this point in relation to the case where several undertakings intend to respond jointly to an invitation to tender. Under this provision, groups of service providers are expressly permitted to tender and the contracting authority may not require these groups `to assume a specific legal form in order to submit the tender'.

20 These various provisions make it clear that the Community legislature is less concerned with the legal form which service providers assume than with their ability to carry out the tasks entrusted to them upon the award of public contracts, or to gather together the resources for the performance of the contract regardless of their own organisation. The elimination of obstacles linked to the legal status of operators constitutes a means of increasing tenders, particularly those from undertakings from Member States of the Community other than the State in which the contract awarding procedure takes place, without compromising the substantive requirements for proper performance of services.

21 Therefore, the approach to adopt in interpreting Directive 92/50 should be more functional than strict. Accordingly, although they seem to reflect a certain formalism, some of the obligations laid down by Directive 92/50 are specifically intended to promote the proper performance of public contracts, limiting the risks to which contracting authorities are exposed.

22 A significant example of this type of requirement is provided by Article 26(3), which permits the contracting authority to require legal persons to `... indicate... the names and the relevant professional qualifications of the staff to be responsible for the performance of the service'. If it cannot be prohibited to award a contract to a legal person on the sole pretext of its legal form, it is just as important not to deprive the contracting authority of information which will enable it to evaluate the capability of a service provider to carry out the contract under the conditions laid down.

23 The Community legislature has therefore ensured that the full exercise of the freedom of movement does not compromise the proper performance of the services, an element without which the Community legislation loses all its meaning. Directive 92/50, like the interpretation to be applied to it, pivots between the two essential requirements of providing for a sufficient liberalisation of contract-awarding procedures and of setting standards which assure contracting authorities that they receive quality services.

24 Contracting authorities should be in a position to assess the capability of tenderers to carry out the contracts in the required manner.

25 This is the objective of Articles 31 and 32 of Directive 92/50. The first article lists the financial and economic proof which can be required from service providers, states how it can be provided and gives an alternative solution in the event that a service provider is unable to produce the requested references. The second article lays down a number of criteria for determining the capability of service providers to supply the services requested, draws up a list of the means of evidence of their technical capacity and indicates how the contracting authority may request them.

26 It is not necessary to discuss the reasons for these provisions at any length, the object of these articles evidently being to protect the interests of the contracting authority against applications from economic operators more concerned about securing lucrative contracts than about the main task, that is to say, performing them scrupulously.

27 Nevertheless, from their terms we can draw two indications also relevant in the analysis of the question referred in this case.

28 First, although an abundance of tenders is in itself in the interests of the contracting authority, this should not be achieved at the cost of mediocre services. Such a requirement legitimates those safeguards and justifies that the interpretation given to the provisions establishing them should take account of the risks of fraud liable to stifle their protective effect. The consequences of accepting that the legal conditions laid down by Directive 92/50 can be fulfilled by persons other than the tendering undertaking should, therefore, be carefully assessed.

29 Secondly, although the reference made by those two articles to the service provider could prompt an interpretation to the effect that the production of proof is limited to the service provider himself, (7) other passages militate in favour of a less strict reading.

30 Thus, Article 31(3) allows the service provider to prove, under certain conditions, his economic and financial standing `... by any other document which the contracting authority considers appropriate', which, by giving the contracting authority a certain degree of discretion, allows it to accept proof produced by persons other than the service provider as long as they offer the same guarantees. Likewise, Article 32(2)(c) expressly refers to the case where the technicians or the technical bodies on which the service provider relies do not belong directly to the service provider. Still other provisions go in this direction, such as Article 32(2)(h), which accepts the possibility of the service provider using a sub-contractor, or Article 32(2)(e), which provides for `a statement of the tool, plant or technical equipment available to the service provider for carrying out the services', (8) thus not limiting the statement to the undertaking's own equipment.

31 `Personalisation' of the capacities required by the contracting authority from the tenderer is therefore called into question by the very wording of Directive 92/50, as it makes several references to availability of means external to the undertaking. This circumstance, confirming what is suggested by the aims pursued by Directive 92/50, prompts a flexible interpretation of the provisions regarding proof of tenderers' standing.

The Ballast Nedam Groep cases

32 The Court's judgments of 14 April 1994 (9) and 18 December 1997 (10) in the Ballast Nedam Groep cases confirm this approach.

33 In Ballast Nedam Groep I, the question was whether a holding company could be excluded from participating in the procedures for public works contracts because it did not carry out the work itself - in that case by the refusal to renew the approval which it had been awarded until then - and, if not, under which conditions it could prove the necessary standing for such participation. (11)

34 The Court held that the directives applicable in this case (12) `... must be interpreted as meaning that they permit, for the purposes of the assessment of the criteria to be satisfied by a contractor when an application for registration by the dominant legal person of a group is being examined, account to be taken of companies belonging to that group, provided that the legal person in question establishes that it actually has available the resources of those companies which are necessary for carrying out the works' and that `[it] is for the national court to assess whether such proof has been produced in the main proceedings'. (13)

35 The Court therefore accepted that an economic operator not in a position to carry out the contract himself because he does not fulfil the qualitative selection criteria required by the provisions may rely on the resources of other companies, provided that those resources are actually available to him for his use.

36 Two points enabling the exact effect of this ruling to be ascertained, and therefore also enabling its application to the present case to be determined, must now be examined.

37 First of all, in Ballast Nedam Groep I, the Court ruled on the interpretation of the Community legislation regulating public works contracts, whilst the present reference for a preliminary ruling concerns Community law governing public service contracts. It is therefore quite legitimate to examine whether that which applies to one sector is also applicable to the other.

38 The differences between the two bodies of legislation result in more explicit references, in the area of public works contracts, (14) to the right for contractors to entrust performance of contracts to other operators. If they are added to the arguments in favour of this right in the works sector, these differences do, in my view, detract from the factors advanced above (15) supporting the possibility of tenderers in the area of services having the same right.

39 In order to refuse to transpose Ballast Nedam Groep I to the area of public service contracts, on the ground that the subject-matter of the contract is not the same, it would be necessary to show that, by their nature, provisions of services do not lend themselves to the use of external resources as much as works contracts.

40 However, there is no evidence of this. Moreover, I have difficulty accepting the reasons which would dictate that the technical and financial conditions required by the tenderers should be fulfilled by the operator himself in the area of services when they cannot be so fulfilled in the area of works contracts. Those reasons are all the less evident in relation to the proof of an undertaking's economic and financial standing since the strictly financial and quantitative guarantee which they seek to establish bears no relation to the subject-matter of the contract. As regards evidence of the technical capability of the service provider, it is sufficient to recall the terms of Article 32(2)(c) of Directive 92/50, under which the contracting authority may be informed of the involvement of any technicians or technical bodies external to the service provider. This provision explicitly confirms that, in the area of public service contracts, external support can be relied upon by tenderers in support of their bids.

41 The ruling in Ballast Nedam Groep I is, therefore, in my view, fully applicable in this respect.

42 The second point concerns the position of the tendering company in relation to the companies upon whose standing and capability it wishes to rely. As the Italian Government and Holst Italia have observed, the tenderer, Ruhrwasser, does not have any dominant influence over the undertaking holding the required qualifications in the present case, Ruhrverband. In Ballast Nedam Groep

I, on the other hand, the Court took the point that the holding company claiming the right to tender was the dominant legal person in the group.

43 One could conclude that the dominant position of an undertaking is a necessary condition for recognition of a company's right to rely on standing and capabilities which are not its own. It is clear, in fact, that the wider the power of decision conferred on the tenderer in relation to other companies, the more it guarantees the contracting body that those companies' resources will be at the contractor's disposal for the needs of the contract.

44 However, I do not think that the making available of resources needed for the proper performance of the contract, but external to the service provider, necessarily supposes a position of subordination, with regard to the tenderer, of the undertakings having the capacities or some of the capacities claimed by the tenderer. As we have seen, the objective of Directive 92/50 dictates an interpretation favourable to the general access of undertakings to public contracts, provided that their selection is made on the basis of proof of the competence actually available to the undertaking and on the solidity of the guarantees which they offer.

45 It is in that sense that the principles contained in Ballast Nedam Groep I should be read and applied to the present case.

46 The Court stated that the performance of works by legal persons separate from the holding company to which they are awarded does not warrant the latter's exclusion from the procedures for participating in the award of public contracts. The Court added that the nature of the legal link between a company and its subsidiaries did not matter (16) and that it was for the national court to assess, in the light of the factual and legal circumstances before it, whether proof, by the company, of the actual availability of resources of its subsidiaries had been adduced in the main proceedings. (17)

47 It is striking that no account was taken in that judgment of the relevance, as regards the question of being certain that the resources sought by the competent authority are actually available, of the decision-making power held by the holding company by virtue of its position as parent company. On the contrary, the emphasis is placed on the irrelevance, for the purposes in view, of its legal organisation and on the real importance of direct review by the court of the effectiveness of that making available of resources.

48 That finding and the factors explained above, which can be derived from the objectives pursued by Directive 92/50 and its tenor, suggest that the ruling in Ballast Nedam Groep I should be applied to the relationships between Ruhrwasser and Ruhrverband, although these connections of ownership are reversed in comparison with that decided case and, instead of being `dominant', the company in question is in a subordinate position.

49 Of course, it is not a question of drawing from such two different legal situations the conclusion that the contracting authority will have, in both cases, the same guarantee that resources external to the tenderer undertaking will actually be made available.

50 I am only pointing out that the nature of the legal link between two undertakings should not be allowed to prejudge the question whether the making available of resources, for which Directive 92/50 permits contracting authorities to require proof, is certain to take place. In other words, if the national court is at liberty to consider that, in view of the characteristics of that link or of other factual and legal circumstances specific to the case, the contracting authority has no certainty of being able to call on the skills needed for the performance of the contract, it appears to me excessive to hold that, as a matter of principle, the fact that an undertaking, in responding to an invitation to tender, relies on the technical, financial and economic resources of a company to which it belongs wholly or in part should prevent it from tendering. The method used to ensure the actual availability of the resources and guarantees required by the contracting authority does not matter, as long as that availability can be verified.

51 There are, in fact, no considerations on the basis of which it could be argued that the nature of the legal relations between Ruhrwasser and Ruhrverband necessarily and a priori exclude the existence of obligations, of a statutory or contractual nature, incumbent on the latter party, of which the binding force would provide the Municipality of Cagliari with the certainty that resources necessary for the performance of the contract would actually be available. The answer to this question depends on consideration of the facts reported in the file and on the elements of national law applicable, on which only the national court can carry out an assessment.

Appraisal by the national court of certain elements of fact and of law

52 In order to satisfy itself that the tenderer actually has available to it the external resources which it claims to have, the referring court is asked to carry out an assessment of elements of fact and of law which concern the content of the agreements possibly concluded between Ruhrwasser, RWG and Ruhrverband - or between the two companies concerned by the contract in question - or the relations statutorily established between them, and also the binding nature of the legal link binding these two companies together.

53 Ascertaining the content of the obligation binding the parent company to its subsidiary should make it certain that the technical abilities and financial guarantees relied upon by the latter will properly contribute to the achievement of the operations envisaged for the performance of the public contract.

54 In the present case, the economic and financial proof required by the contracting authority relates to the level of annual average turnover in the area of management of sewage treatment plants and water collection. That requirement, which falls under Article 31(1)(c) of Directive 92/50, cannot, in my view, be satisfied unless it is proven that the tenderer is in a position to rely, in a significant manner, on the services of the company to which it refers.

55 That reference guarantees, in the present case, the contracting authority the benefit of minimal professional experience, which, in order to be really useful, must be directly employed in the performance of the contract. Therefore, it is essential to ascertain that the company whose experience is relied upon will be the one which, whilst not carrying out the entire range of activities described by the contracting authority, will at least provide the management, thus making its technical ability available. (18)

56 This reasoning is capable of being applied to the second guarantee sought by the contracting authority, which concerns experience of actual management of a domestic sewage treatment plant for two consecutive years during the previous three years. Likewise, laying down such a criterion does not make sense unless the tenderer who wins the contract relying on the experience of another company is in a position to prove that the latter company will be involved in performance of the contract to a significant degree.

57 Secondly, in assessing whether the resources relied upon will actually be available, it is appropriate to ascertain whether the legal instrument used for this purpose is not only in order but also ensures the intended effects by conferring a binding force on them. (19)

58 It will be legitimate for the national court to investigate, for example, whether an agreement has been concluded under which the parent company undertakes to make available to its subsidiary a certain number of technical resources and financial guarantees, whether this agreement is truly binding on the parent company and whether, in the case of non-performance, the parent company could be sued before the competent courts.

59 Let me make it clear that the relationship between the two companies can be more or less close and the economic autonomy of the subsidiary in relation to its parent company more or less wide, according to the level of participation of one company in the share capital of the other, which is not without effect on the guarantees and resources which will be available to the contracting authority.

60 Indeed, if the parent company was behind the decision to respond to the invitation to tender - although this decision is formally attributed to the subsidiary - it is unlikely that it will refuse to make available the resources at its disposal.

61 However, it cannot be totally excluded that the subsidiary tenderer, being the only party legally bound to the contracting authority, encounters a change of policy by the decision-making parent company.

62 It is to be feared that the contracting authority, which stands to suffer most from the unforeseen effects of a poorly performed or non-performed contract and faced with the impossibility of obtaining from its co-contractor prompt and satisfactory performance of the contract or financial compensation for the latter's default, would have no right of action against the parent company.

63 Without prejudging the position in national law, I would say that it is likely that the contractual non-performance could not be declared or compensated if the parent company, owing but not performing the obligation to make resources available, entirely controls the decision making within its subsidiary. Alone disposing of the power to secure performance of the obligations in question through the courts, it thus holds the power to undo its own commitments. The guarantees provided to the contracting authority then risk being no more than a veil masking the tenderer's inability to fulfil the obligations of the contract.

64 The disadvantage for the contracting authority is, therefore, that the company which holds the power to decide to make available the resources and guarantees necessary for the contract and the company which assumes responsibility as co-contractor are two separate legal persons. Nor must it be overlooked that any proceedings brought against the subsidiary will not be without consequences for the parent company.

65 In the present case, however, Ruhrwasser appears to have relative autonomy in relation to Ruhrverband since, as we have seen, its capital is divided in equal parts between six companies of which only one, RWG, is wholly owned by Ruhrverband.

66 Before determining that Ruhrwasser actually has the power to assert its rights against the parent company, the national court will have to satisfy itself that the legal means exist on the basis of which the tenderer can properly claim to have the standing relied upon.

67 What is important therefore, in this case, is that the legal instruments which bind Ruhrwasser to Ruhrverband must have a binding legal force enabling the tenderer to be certain of the parent company's assistance.

Conclusion

68 In the light of these considerations, I propose that the Court answer the question referred for a preliminary ruling by the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per la Sardegna as follows:

Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts is to be interpreted as not precluding a contracting authority from taking account, for the assessment of the selection criteria of the financial and technical standing which a company must satisfy upon examination of a bid made during a tendering procedure for the award of a public service contract, of the standing of another company which is the sole shareholder of one of the companies having a shareholding in the first-mentioned company, provided that the latter company proves that it actually has available the resources of the company on which it relies.

It is for the national court to assess whether the requisite proof in that regard has been adduced in the main proceedings.

For that purpose, the national court must, in particular, make sure that the company whose standing is taken into account is obliged to take an appropriate part in the performance of the contract, having regard to the purpose of the references relied upon.

(10) - Case C-5/97 [1997] ECR I-7549, hereinafter `Ballast Nedam Groep II'.

(11) - Ballast Nedam Groep II interprets the first ruling on the question of the obligatory or discretionary character of taking into account references of third party companies by the authority responsible for deciding on the application for registration. The Court stated `... the authority competent to decide on an application for registration submitted by a dominant legal person of a group is under an obligation, where it is established that that person actually has available to it the resources of the companies belonging to the group that are necessary to carry out the contracts, to take account of the references of those companies in assessing the suitability of the legal person concerned...' (point 14, my emphasis). This judgment is of less direct interest to the current case than Ballast Nedam Groep I since, in the main case which gave rise to the question in the present case, the very existence of a right - and not its obligatory or discretionary character - to have account taken of references external to the tenderer which the contracting authority has recognised is in issue.

(12) - Directive 71/304/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning abolition of restrictions on freedom to provide services in respect of public works contracts and on the award of public works contracts to contractors acting through agencies or branches (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 678) and Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682).

(13) - Paragraph 18, my emphasis.

(14) - According to the wording of Directive 71/304, `... public works contracts may be awarded to persons covered by that directive who carry out the work through agencies or branches' (Ballast Nedam Groep I, paragraph 10). Council Directive 89/440/EEC of 18 July 1989, amending Directive 71/305 (OJ 1989 L 210, p. 1), provides, moreover, that public works contracts `... have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works or a work, or "the execution by whatever means of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority"' (Ballast Nedam Groep I, paragraph 14).

(15) - Paragraphs 14 to 31 of this Opinion.

(16) - Ballast Nedam Groep I, paragraph 17.

(17) - Ibid.

(18) - For the sake of completeness, it should be observed that the referring court cannot always confer the same meaning on the proofs required by Directive 92/50, when they concern an external operator. So the information concerning the financial soundness of a company, when relied upon by the tenderer undertaking before the contracting authority, can hardly be considered to be a real guarantee when the company which has won the contract is not itself viable. In the absence of a direct contractual relation between the contracting authority and the third party, the financial standing of the latter party might be inadequate to safeguard the interests of the entity awarding the contract. The idea of `actually making available' does not have therefore the same virtues, as far as financial and economic standing is concerned, and it is not certain that, in that circumstance, the contracting authority would be well advised to satisfy itself with proof external to the tenderer. This difference cannot be without effect on the freedom of contracting authorities to rely on this type of guarantee or on the interpretation which can be made of applicable Community law. Furthermore, it is important to know the content of commitments which link the tenderer undertaking to the third-party undertaking and which can bind the latter to the contracting authority.

(19) - It follows from the information in the file that Ruhrverband carries out a public service task in Germany and does not have the right to carry out its task outside Germany. The delimitation of its objects, on which its freedom of action depends, can thus assist the assessment by the national court of its ability actually to make available to the contracting authority the resources on which Ruhrwasser is counting.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 18 March 1999.
RI.SAN. Srl v Comune di Ischia, Italia Lavoro SpA and Ischia Ambiente SpA.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale della Campania - Italy.
Freedom of establishment - Freedom to provide services - Organisation of urban waste collection service.
Case C-108/98.

A - Introduction

1 The present reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the applicability of provisions in the fields of freedom to provide services, freedom of establishment, competition law and of Directive 92/50/EEC relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts. (1)

2 The applicant in the main proceedings, RI.SAN. Srl, which brought two actions before the national court for the annulment of the two municipal council resolutions mentioned below, was entrusted with the collection of solid urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia up to 4 January 1997. By municipal council resolution of 7 November 1996, the urban waste removal service was entrusted to Ischia Ambiente SpA - without a public tendering procedure.

3 The company Ischia Ambiente SpA was set up by the Municipality of Ischia and GEPI SpA, a State-owned financing company, (2) on the basis of the municipal council resolution of 6 July 1966.

4 Under Italian law, in order to promote employment, the municipalities are entitled to set up public limited companies with GEPI SpA, inter alia for the purpose of operating local public services. Italian law allows local authorities to select GEPI SpA directly as partner for operating a local public service, without any form of selection procedure or public tendering. GEPI SpA is required to transfer its shareholding in such mixed capital companies within five years by public tender.

5 In that regard, RI.SAN Srl claims that the municipal council resolutions infringe Community law. The referring court considers, therefore, that the present case raises questions on the interpretation of Article 59 et seq. of the EC Treaty and of the provisions of competition law.

B - The facts and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

6 The first resolution challenged, namely Municipal Council Resolution No 25 of 19 March 1996, concerns the constitution with GEPI SpA of a public limited company, Ischia Ambiente SpA, with a majority public shareholding, for the removal of solid urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia. That resolution also approved the statutes of the company to be formed and the corresponding technical, economic and financial plans. The Municipality of Ischia subscribed 51% and GEPI SpA 49% of the share capital of Ischia Ambiente SpA.

7 In its action for annulment relating to these matters, RI.SAN Srl pleads infringement of several Italian laws and also procedural infringement in the absence of any public procedure for the selection of the co-shareholder.

8 Municipal Council Resolution No 99 of 7 November 1996 entrusted Ischia Ambiente SpA with the removal of solid urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia. In that regard, apart from the infringement of several Italian laws, RI.SAN Srl alleges in particular that the contract for operating the public service was awarded without any tendering procedure either for the selection of the second shareholder of the mixed-capital company or for the award of the contract and that that constitutes - in its opinion - a manifest breach of Community law.

9 Municipal Council Resolution No 25 on the constitution of a mixed-capital public limited company with a mainly public shareholding was expressly adopted on the basis of Article 4(6) of Law No 95 of 29 March 1995. Under that provision, the municipalities and provinces are allowed, in order to promote employment or the re-employment of workers, to set up public limited companies with GEPI SpA inter alia for the purpose of operating local public services. Article 4(8) of that law requires GEPI SpA to transfer its shareholdings in the aforesaid companies within five years by means of a public tendering procedure in accordance with the provisions governing GEPI SpA's activities.

10 According to the explanations given by the national court, the relevant provisions of national law are designed to allow the local authorities to choose directly and without any form of selection procedure GEPI SpA as partner for the operation of local public services, provided that this serves the purpose of promoting the employment or re-employment of workers. In this case that requirement is satisfied, since in all the contested measures it is, inter alia, declared that the objective is to ensure that employment levels in the sector are maintained.

11 For the national court, therefore, that raises the question whether Article 4(6) of Law No 95 is compatible with Community law. The main proceedings involve the `direct selection of a private party - without any competition - for the operation of a local public service in accordance with a special procedure expressly provided for by the national Law on the administrative autonomy of local authorities (legge nationale sur le autonomi locali), Law No 142 of 8 June 1990, Article 22(3)(e), namely the creation of a limited company whose capital is constituted mainly by public funds from the local authority and which will automatically be entrusted with the operation of this public utility'. That therefore rules out any competition, even at the stage of selecting the partner. For the national court those provisions are in direct conflict with the provisions on freedom to provide services and on free competition set out in the EC Treaty.

12 The national court therefore essentially seeks to ascertain whether a presumed breach of the principles of freedom to provide services and effective competition arising from the direct choice of GEPI SpA as partner by the Municipality of Ischia `can be justified by virtue of the derogations provided for and allowed by the Treaty (Articles 55, 66 and 90(2))'. The fact that `in the initial stage of constitution of the mixed management company for operation of the local public utilities, and for the first five years of its existence, normal recourse to non-discriminatory competitive selection procedures for the choice of the operator of the public utility' is excluded could be considered as constituting such a breach. According to the provisions referred to by the national court and to the basic concepts underlying the Treaty, it is as a rule necessary to conduct a public tendering procedure or a restricted public selection procedure in order to guarantee effective competition and transparency in the selection of the partner. Since no such procedure was conducted, (3) it must be determined whether the action taken by the municipality was `justified'.

13 For the national court, therefore, the issue is not the applicability of Directive 92/50 but the general applicability of Articles 55, 60 and 90(2) of the EC Treaty. The national court moreover regards the Directive as not applicable, since the services in question are not provided to a contracting authority for consideration on the basis of a contract for pecuniary interest.

14 The Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale della Campania (Naples) therefore referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

`(1) Must Article 55 of the Treaty (which is applicable inter alia to the services sector by virtue of the reference in Article 66 of the Treaty), pursuant to which "[t]he provisions of this Chapter shall not apply, so far as any given Member State is concerned, to activities which in that State are connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority", must be interpreted so widely as to include the activities of GEPI SpA (later Itainvest SpA) as a participant in local authorities' mixed companies for the operation of local public utilities, within the meaning of 4(6) of Law No 95 of 29 March 1995 (converting into a statute, with amendments, Decree-law

No 26 of 31 January 1995), even where that participation purports to be for the purpose of "promoting employment or the reemployment of workers" already assigned to the service the management of which is at issue, having regard to Article 5 of Law No 184 of 22 March 1971 establishing GEPI SpA, which gives GEPI SpA the same task of "contributing to the maintenance and growth of employment levels facing temporary difficulties, such as to demonstrate the specific possibility of reorganising the undertakings concerned", in the manner set out therein?

(2) In view of the abovementioned legislation governing GEPI SpA (later Itainvest SpA), may there be applicable to this case the derogation provided for in Article 90(2) of the Treaty according to which "[u]ndertakings entrusted with the operation of services of general economic interest... shall be subject to the rules contained in this Treaty, in particular to the rules on competition, in so far as the application of those rules does not obstruct the performance in law or in fact, of the particular tasks assigned to them"?'

C - The relevant legislation

Community law

15 Directive 92/50, which finds its legal basis in Article 57(2), last sentence, and Article 66 of the EC Treaty, contains the provisions concerning the procedure for awarding public service contracts. It defines, inter alia, the terms `public service contract' and `contracting authority'. Contracting authorities are required to award contracts which have as their object the services listed in Annex IA and IB of the directive in accordance with the provisions of the directive, and thus inter alia by way of public tendering procedure. To that end the various award procedures are also laid down in the directive.

16 Article 1 of the Directive defines the scope of application as follows:

`For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) public service contracts shall mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority,...

(b) contracting authorities shall mean the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law.

Body governed by public law means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

17 Article 6 of Directive 92/50 provides for the following derogation:

`This Directive shall not apply to public service contracts awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1 (b) on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision which is compatible with the Treaty.'

National law

18 GEPI SpA was constituted on the basis of Article 5 of Law No 184/71 of 22 March 1971. (4) GEPI SpA was established with the express purpose of maintaining and increasing employment levels.

19 Article 22(3)(a) to (e) of Law No 142/90 of 8 June 1990 (5) on local autonomy provides that municipalities and provinces may operate the public service undertakings which fall within their spheres of competence in different ways. So far as is relevant to the present case, this can be done by direct management (a), by award of a concession to third parties (b), or by means of a public limited company (e) the share capital of which is constituted mainly by public funds and, where necessary, with public or private partners. The decisive factors in this respect are the appropriateness of the procedure and the nature of the services to be provided.

20 Article 4(6) of Law No 95/95 of 29 March 1995 concerning mixed capital companies of a public-service nature (6) allows the municipalities and provinces to set up public limited companies directly with GEPI SpA inter alia for the purpose of operating local public services, with a view to promoting employment and re-employment of workers. Article 4(8) requires GEPI SpA to transfer its shareholdings in such companies within five years by means of a public tendering procedure.

D - Arguments of the parties

21 RI.SAN Srl takes the view that Directive 92/50 is applicable in this case. As its structure as a limited company governed by private law shows, Ischia Ambiente SpA is not a contracting authority and consequently the directive applies. Article 6 precludes application of the directive only in the specific case where a public service contract is awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority and is not, therefore, active commercially. Nor - so RI.SAN Srl claims - is there an award of a concession in this case. As Ischia Ambiente SpA is also not part of the public administration, the services provided are not so-called in-house services, namely services performed by way of direct management. It follows that the contract for the removal of solid urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia should have been awarded by public tender in compliance with Directive 92/50.

22 GEPI SpA and Ischia Ambiente SpA take the view that the primary-law provisions of the Treaty do not apply in this case since a purely domestic (Italian) situation is concerned. As regards Directive 92/50, both of those companies claim that the task entrusted to Ischia Ambiente SpA, namely the removal of solid urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia, constitutes an in-house service. Both GEPI SpA and Ischia Ambiente SpA form an integral part of the administration and the discharge of the task was simply the subject of internal delegation between organs. Directive 92/50, however, applies only to contracts awarded to third parties which are not part of the administration. In the case of GEPI SpA, moreover, there is an award of a concession, which also falls outside the scope of Directive 92/50, since that directive applies only to services provided under public service contracts. Were Directive 92/50 nevertheless to apply, the derogation allowed under Article 6 would be relevant since both GEPI SpA and Ischia Ambiente SpA are contracting authorities. As a result, this case falls outside the scope of the Directive. The majority - at least - of both companies' share-capital was paid up with public funds and over half the members of the Board of Directors of Ischia Ambiente SpA represent the Municipality: therefore, all the parties concerned are contracting authorities.

23 The Municipality of Ischia first queries the relevance to the decision in the main proceedings of the questions referred for a preliminary ruling. Since the Municipality is the majority shareholder of Ischia Ambiente SpA and GEPI SpA is part of the public administration, Community law does not apply. In the event of infringement of the provisions of Directive 92/50, `Article 55 of the EC treaty would apply'. In any event, what it concerned in this case was in-house services of the local authority undertaken in the public interest. Furthermore, the objectives pursued justify the procedure adopted. The procedure chosen enables the local authorities to cope with economic and financial difficulties, thereby securing the supply of public services to their citizens. Moreover, such a procedure maintains existing jobs and can even create new jobs. The fact that the urban waste removal service was entrusted to Ischia Ambiente SpA for a limited period of five years also shows that the Italian legislation is not incompatible with Community law.

24 The Italian Government, too, maintains that the provisions of the Treaty do not apply in this case since a purely domestic situation is concerned. Moreover, both GEPI SpA and Ischia Ambiente SpA are part of the public administration and are not undertakings pursuing economic activities. The situation in point does not fall within the scope of the provisions on freedom to provide services or freedom of establishment. Since those companies do not compete in operating the waste removal service, there cannot be any breach of the competition provision of the Treaty in this respect. The fact that this case involves in-house services precludes the applicability of Directive 92/50. Ischia Ambiente SpA is, as a part of the public administration. There is thus no contract for the provision of services for pecuniary interest.

25 The Commission also maintains that the context is purely domestic and that, therefore, the provisions of the Treaty cited by the national court do not apply here. As regards the applicability of Directive 92/50, the Commission submits that this case concerns either a concession or in-house services. In view of the explanations provided by the national court, the Commission believes either hypothesis is possible, but the facts cannot be precisely classified on the basis of the individual indications provided. If either of these hypotheses were true, Directive 92/50 would not apply to the facts at issue in the main proceedings. The Commission is not in a position to provide a definitive answer in absence of more complete information. For want of that information, the Commission thinks that it is also possible that the task of removing urban waste in the Municipality of Ischia was entrusted to Ischia Ambiente SpA on the basis of an agreement or public contract for pecuniary interest. In that case, Directive 92/50 would in principle apply. However, the information provided by the national court is in this respect also too scant for the Commission to answer that question definitively. It is therefore for the national court itself to determine whether Directive 92/50 applies in the light of the provisions of that directive and the criteria developed by the case-law of the Court.

26 Where necessary, I shall come back in the course of the following analysis to the other arguments put forward by the parties in their written pleadings or at the hearing.

C - Analysis

The first question

27 By its first question the referring court wishes to establish whether the activity of GEPI SpA falls within the scope of Article 55 of the EC Treaty, read in conjunction with Article 66 according to which the rules concerning freedom to provide services do not apply to activities which in a Member State are connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority.

28 Although - as may be seen from the order for reference - that question ultimately seeks to establish whether or not an open tendering procedure for the selection of the partner, in this case GEPI SpA, would have been required under the general principles laid down in the Treaty, it would seem appropriate to ascertain first whether, in accordance with Articles 55 and 66 of the EC Treaty, the rules concerning freedom to provide services and freedom of establishment apply at all in this case. Whether or not this is a general obligation to initiate a public tendering procedure is a question which can be left aside for the time being.

29 GEPI SpA set up a company with the Municipality of Ischia for the management of a local public service. In that regard, however, the Commission correctly suggests that as a result the rules applicable under the Treaty are not the rules governing the services sector but rather those concerning freedom of establishment.

30 According to case-law of the Court, the provisions of the chapter on services are subordinate to those of the chapter on the right of establishment. (7)

31 Services within the meaning of Article 60 of the EC Treaty are characterised by their temporary nature. That criterion is met where a service is provided only occasionally (8) or for a limited duration. (9) Moreover, for the rules on freedom of services to apply, there must be a transfrontier element. That is the case where the person providing the service goes to the Member State where the person for whom it is provided is established, (10) or vice versa, (11) or where the service is provided for remuneration. (12)

32 Freedom of establishment is characterised by a longer duration of the service provided: the frequency, regularity and continuity of the service are further criteria distinguishing freedom of establishment from the freedom to provide services.

33 Managing a local public service is an activity of long duration. Such activity is exercised continuously at set intervals. In view of its importance, that activity must be carried out on a regular basis. The proper performance of the service in question requires more than the merely occasional removal of urban waste.

34 As the service provider must be on the spot and the service must be repeated frequently, the rules concerning freedom of establishment must be taken into consideration in appraising the facts at issue here.

35 The scope of the right to establishment ratione personae must also be taken into account in this case since, in accordance with Article 58 of the EC Treaty, companies are also entitled to that right.

36 For the rules on freedom of establishment to apply, there must, however, also be some element relevant to Community law. That is the case only if the factual context involves a transfrontier element, namely if the freedom of movement of a company of another Member State is restricted.

37 However, there is no such transfrontier element here: GEPI SpA and RI.SAN Srl are both Italian companies established in Italy. The same is true of Ischia Ambiente SpA. The only other party involved is the Italian Municipality of Ischia. Therefore, the transfrontier element is lacking in this case.

38 In the result, in view of this purely domestic context, the Community rules on freedom of establishment do not apply and there is, therefore, no need to examine whether the derogation provided for in Article 55 of the EC Treaty is relevant. Nor is it necessary to consider the question raised implicitly by the national court whether, by virtue of the principles underlying the Treaty, there is a general obligation to initiate public tendering procedures - which, moreover, is not evident. Whether a specific obligation to initiate a procedure is a matter which will fail to be addressed is only in the context of the applicability of Directive 92/50.

39 By its second question, the national court wishes to know whether Article 90(2) of the Treaty applies to the activities of GEPI SpA.

40 Article 90(1) of the EC Treaty requires Member States, with regard to public undertakings, inter alia neither to enact nor maintain in force any measure contrary to the rules contained in the EC Treaty. By virtue of Article 90(2), undertakings entrusted with the operation of services of general economic interest are subject to the rules contained in the Treaty, in particular to the rules on competition, in so far as the application of such rules does not obstruct the performance, in law or in fact, of the particular tasks assigned to them.

41 The Italian Government, the Commission and GEPI SpA maintain that, in view of the purely domestic factual context, Article 90 of the EC Treaty does not apply either. The Commission argues, moreover, that the undertakings to which the restriction set out in Article 90(2) applies must be undertakings within the meaning of Article 90(1). However, GEPI SpA is not, it maintains, such an undertaking.

42 By virtue of its wording, Article 90(2) of the EC Treaty covers both public and private undertakings. However, Article 90(2) by no means applies only to undertakings within the meaning of Article 90(1) of the Treaty, (13) so that there is no need to determine whether or not GEPI SpA is an undertaking within the meaning of Article 90(1).

43 GEPI SpA must, however, be an undertaking within the meaning of Article 90(2) of the Treaty. To qualify as such, GEPI SpA must be `entrusted with the operation of services of general economic interest'. The concept of services within the meaning of Article 90(2) differs from that within the meaning of Article 60. For the purposes of Article 90(2) of the Treaty, services encompass services of all kinds. That includes the making available, providing and distribution of services in kind and covers, in particular, the provision of services for the public. At this point already, it is clear that the activities of GEPI SpA cannot attract the application of Article 90(2). GEPI SpA was constituted with the objectives to establishing and increasing employment. However, GEPI SpA does not, unlike Ischia Ambiente SpA, offer any services in the form, for example, of itself being active in the context of services for the public. It is purely a state-owned financing company participating in companies together with the public authorities. That does not qualify as a supply of services for the purposes of Article 90(2) of the Treaty since the financing of and participating in companies are not public services. The fact that the companies of which GEPI SpA is a joint founder might well provide services within the meaning of Article 90(2) of the Treaty is irrelevant here since only the activities of GEPI SpA are material and these, specifically, do not consist in providing services.

44 Contrary to the view, set out above, put forward by the Italian Government, the Commission and GEPI SpA, the application of the provisions of Article 90 of the Treaty is not precluded merely because a purely domestic situation is in point. Both Article 90(1) and Article 90(2) refer to all provisions of the Treaty. These include the rules on freedom of establishment but these rules, here, as I have shown above, do not, in fact apply on account of the domestic context. That non-applicability clearly extends also to the sphere of Article 90 of the Treaty. If, however, as an undertaking entrusted with the operation of services, GEPI SpA were to fall within the scope of Article 90(2) of the Treaty, the other rules contained in the Treaty would also have to be taken into account. The rules on competition are particularly significant in the context of Article 90(2): those rules can apply to situations which are to begin with purely domestic if adverse effects on the common market are possible. Consequently, it is not possible to refuse to regard Article 90(2) of the Treaty as applicable merely on the ground that a purely domestic situation is concerned.

45 In the final analysis, however, Article 90(2) of the EC Treaty does not apply in this case since GEPI SpA is not an undertaking entrusted with the operation of services within the meaning of that provision.

The applicability of Directive 92/50

46 Although in the questions referred for a preliminary ruling the national court has not asked

this Court to take a view on the applicability of Directive 92/50, that point must be examined in the interests of a thorough analysis of the facts at issue. The applicability of the directive must be examined, in particular, in order to provide the national court with all the necessary material for resolving the dispute, especially since the national court proceeds on the assumption that free competition is impeded and that Directive 92/50 is designed to eliminate practices restricting competition. (14)

47 In its order for reference the national court takes the view, relying on the eighth recital of the directive, (15) that the directive does not apply since the court does not regard assignment of the task of waste removal to Ischia Ambiente SpA as a public-service contract within the meaning of the directive, but rather as the grant of a concession falling outside the scope of the directive.

48 Unlike RI.SAN Srl, GEPI SpA, Ischia Ambiente SpA and the Italian Government also argue that Directive 92/50 does not apply, but the Commission does not wish to express a definitive opinion in that regard in view of the - in its opinion - insufficient information available.

49 Directive 92/50 only applies if the legal relationship between the Municipality of Ischia and Ischia Ambiente SpA is based on a public-service contract within the meaning of Article 1(a) of the Directive. In accordance with the eighth recital, the Directive does not apply to the provision of services which is not based on contracts. The directive does not cover concessions. (16) Even in-house services provided by part of the public administration fall outside the scope of Directive 92/50 if only because there is no a public contract in the sense that a third party is entrusted with providing the service.

50 There is no uniform definition of a concession under Community law; however, for there to be a concession, a number of factors must be present. (17) Thus the recipient of the services to be provided must be third, non-contracting, parties. The service to be provided must, moreover, correspond to a task in the general interest, a task as a rule incumbent on a public authority. The remuneration of the concessionaire must be commensurate with the services provided and, lastly, the concessionaire must bear the economic risk connected with the performance of the service.

51 Whether or not there is in this case a concession for the purposes of Community law is a matter for the national court to decide. However, it seems clear that the beneficiaries of the waste disposal service are the residents of the municipality, namely persons who are not parties to the contract. Moreover, it can be said that the necessary general interest in the removal of urban waste also does exist. The regular removal of urban waste is necessary if only on grounds of public health and safety. For this reason, the public authority must either discharge this task itself or have it performed in a manner which enables it to retain a decisive influence. (18) In Italy, according to the written observations of the Italian Government, that task is assigned to the municipalities in implementation of Directive 75/442/EEC. (19) How the remuneration arrangements are governed and the economic risk is shared between the Municipality of Ischia and Ischia Ambiente SpA cannot be conclusively determined on the basis of the information supplied by the national court. It is therefore for the national court to establish whether the various requirements for there to be a grant of a concession are satisfied, in which case Directive 92/50 would not apply.

52 Whether the Municipality and Ischia Ambiente SpA are part of the same public administration - and whether an in-house service is therefore involved - must be established by examining the facts. Contrary to RI.SAN Srl's contention, the fact that Ischia Ambiente SpA is a public limited company does not per se preclude it from being part of the public administration. Ischia Ambiente SpA must instead be classified following functional criteria. (20) In that regard, the degree of influence exerted by the public administration over the company is decisive.

53 The final appreciation of that aspect falls once again to the national court. It is clear from the explanations it has supplied that the Municipality of Ischia holds 51% of the share capital of Ischia Ambiente SpA. The remaining 49% is held by GEPI SpA for a period of five years. GEPI SpA is in its turn wholly owned by the Italian State and acts as a finance company for the purpose, inter alia, of setting up companies with municipalities with a view to performing the tasks incumbent on the latter. GEPI SpA must also be classified by means of a functional appraisal. Even without a full knowledge of the internal organisation of GEPI SpA, it may properly be concluded from the fact that the Italian State holds 100% of its share capital that the company is part of the Italian State in that respect. The Italian State, therefore, through GEPI SpA, has a holding in Ischia Ambiente SpA. It follows that Ischia Ambiente SpA is controlled by public authorities. It would be unduly formalistic to seek to distinguish between the public authorities `Municipality of Ischia' and `Italian State'. In the result, the situation differs in no respect from that which would exist if the Italian State had directly provided the Municipality of Ischia with the funds required to form the company on its own. In the final analysis, the fact that the Municipality of Ischia chose that particular, organisational structure cannot lead to any other classification of Ischia Ambiente SpA.

54 However, in addition to financial interconnections, a delegation of tasks between the public bodies is necessary for it to be possible to say that there is a service `in-house'. In that respect, depending on the circumstances, it might be necessary that the Municipality should control Ischia Ambiente SpA's further activity, for example, by making available further municipal funding and perhaps by setting tariffs for the disposal of urban waste. However, the explanations provided by the national court do not show with absolute certainty whether or not such an allocation of tasks exists. But if the national court were to establish that both the financial and organisational interconnections between the Municipality and Ischia Ambiente SpA correspond to those requirements, then the services would indeed qualify as in-house services and Directive 92/50 would not apply in this case either.

55 Applicability of the directive would come into question, if at all, only if Ischia Ambiente SpA were not part of the public administration, or if the services provided were not in-house services or if there were not a concession within the meaning of Community law. In that case, the directive would become applicable since the Municipality of Ischia, as a local authority, would be a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50. There could also be a contract within the meaning of Article 1(a) of the directive if there were an exchange of services between two distinct legal entities. However, it would have to be a contract for pecuniary interest concluded in writing, (21) which is not the case according to the indications contained in the order of reference.

56 GEPI SpA and the Italian Government argue, moreover, that even if Directive 92/50 were applicable, the derogation provided in Article 6 of the directive would apply.

57 However, the derogating provision in Article 6 of the directive, quoted in paragraph 17 above, would be applicable only under certain conditions. Ischia Ambiente SpA would indeed be a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the directive. The three conditions specified in Article 1(b) of the directive, which must be satisfied concurrently, are fulfilled by (22) Ischia Ambiente SpA. (23) Nevertheless, the public contract should - as expressly required by Article 6 - have been awarded to Ischia Ambiente SpA on the basis of an exclusive right enjoyed by it. Whether or not Ischia Ambiente SpA has such an exclusive right cannot be established from the indications provided in the order for reference. On this matter too the final determination must be made by the national court.

58 To summarise, it may thus be said, that what could be on the basis of the facts in the main proceedings, concerned is either an award of a concession or an `in-house' delegation of tasks. It is ultimately the task of the national court to determine, in the light of the relevant legislation and the criteria laid down by the case-law of the Court, whether one of these situations is concerned. As regards the derogation contained in Article 6 of Directive 92/50, it is also for the national court to establish whether the conditions set out in that article are satisfied.

F - Conclusion

59 In view of the foregoing, I propose that the Court answer the questions referred by the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale della Campania, Naples, as follows:

(1) Article 52 et seq. (or, as the case may be, Article 59 et seq.) of the EC Treaty do not apply to purely domestic situations which lack any specific Community connection where, as in the case at issue, the legality of a provision of national law - pursuant to which municipalities are authorised, freely and without a public tendering procedure, to choose a particular and specifically-named company as partner for constituting a joint undertaking - is challenged before a national court by another undertaking established in the same Member State.

(2) Article 90(2) of the EC Treaty - and, consequently, the provisions of the Treaty and, in particular the rules on competition - are not applicable to an undertaking such as GEPI SpA which was constituted for the sole purpose of forming companies with the municipalities, since that undertaking does not provide services within the meaning of Article 90(2) of the EC Treaty.

(1) - Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1).

(2) - GEPI SpA later became Itainvest SpA and then Italialavoro SpA: for the purposes of this Opinion, the company will nevertheless be referred to as GEPI SpA.

(3) - Moreover, Italian law generally also requires such competitive procedures. However, Article 4(6) of Law No 95 deviates from that rule.

(20) - To ensure a more equitable appraisal of the facts and specificities of each case, the Court has favoured a functional rather than a formal method of analysis. The Court has followed such a method with regard to the notion of `contracting party' since its judgment in Case 31/87 (Beentjes v Netherlands [1988] ECR 4635).

(21) - See Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50.

(22) - The Court ruled to that effect in Case C-44/96 (Mannesmann Anlagebau Austria and Others v Strohal Rotationsdruck [1998] ECR I-73, at paragraphs 20 and 21) with regard to a `body governed by public law' within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54), which has the same wording as Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50.

(23) - Those conditions are as follows:

Body governed by public law means any body

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Cosmas delivered on 1 July 1999.
Teckal Srl v Comune di Viano and Azienda Gas-Acqua Consorziale (AGAC) di Reggio Emilia.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale per l'Emilia-Romagna - Italy.
Public service and public supply contracts - Directives 92/50/EEC and 93/36/EEC - Award by a local authority of a contract for the supply of products and provision of specified services to a consortium of which it is a member.
Case C-107/98.

I - Introduction

1 In this case the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per l'Emilia-Romagna, Sezione di Parma (Regional Administrative Court for Emilia-Romagna, Parma Division) has referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling a question on the interpretation of a provision of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts. (1)

II - Community legal context

2 Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50 provides that, for the purposes of that directive, `public service contracts' are `contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority'. Article 1(b) provides that the term `contracting authorities' means `the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, [and] associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law'.

3 Article 2 of Directive 92/50 states that `if a public contract is intended to cover both products within the meaning of Directive 77/62/EEC and services within the meaning of Annexes I A and I B to this Directive, it shall fall within the scope of this Directive if the value of the services in question exceeds that of the products covered by the contract'.

4 Article 6 of Directive 92/50 provides that the directive `shall not apply to public service contracts awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision which is compatible with the Treaty'.

5 Article 7 of Directive 92/50 provides that the directive is to apply to public service contracts the estimated value of which, net of VAT, is not less than ECU 200 000 and sets out the basis on which, in the case of contracts which do not specify a total price, the estimated contract value is to be estimated. (2)

6 As indicated by its title, Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerns the coordination of procedures for the award of public supply contracts. (3) This directive repealed the previously applicable Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976. (4) However, Article 33 of Directive 93/36 states: `Reference to the repealed [directive] shall be construed as reference to this Directive and should be read in accordance with the correlation table set out in Annex VI'.

7 Article 1(a) of Directive 93/36 provides that, for the purposes of that directive, `public supply contracts' are `contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing involving the purchase, lease[,] rental or hire purchase, with or without option to buy, of products between a supplier (a natural or legal person) and one of the contracting authorities defined in (b) below. The delivery of such products may in addition include siting and installation operations'.

8 Article 1(b) provides that `contracting authorities' are `the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, [and] associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law'. (5)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

9 Article 5(1)(a) of Directive 93/36 states, so far as is relevant to the point at issue here, that its provisions (6) apply to public supply contracts `awarded by the contracting authorities referred to in Article 1(b)... in so far as the products not covered by Annex II are concerned, provided that the estimated value net of VAT is not less than ECU 200 000'.

10 Article 5(2), (3) and (5) specifies the method for calculating the estimated contract value. (7)

III - National legal context

A - Italian Law No 142/90

11 Under Article 22(1) of Italian Law No 142 of 8 June 1990 on the organisation of local authorities, (8) municipalities are to provide for the management of public services involving the production of goods and the performance of activities designed to achieve social purposes and promote economic and civil development of local communities. In accordance with Article 22(3), municipalities may ensure the provision of such local public services in various ways: on a work-and-materials basis, by way of concession to third parties, or using special undertakings, institutions or semi-public companies in which they hold shares.

12 Article 23 of Law No 142/90, which defines special undertakings and non-profit-making institutions, provides (in Article 23(1)) that a special undertaking is a body (ente strumentale) established by a regional or local authority, having legal personality, commercial autonomy and its own statutes as approved by the municipal or provincial council. Article 23(3) provides that the organs of such undertakings and institutions are to be a board of management, a chairman and a director who assumes managerial responsibility, detailed arrangements for appointment and removal of members of the board of management being laid down by the statutes of the regional or local authority. In addition, in performing their activities such undertakings and institutions must, under Article 23(4), meet criteria of effectiveness, efficiency and profitability; they must achieve a balanced budget by balancing costs and receipts, including transfers. Lastly, in accordance with Article 23(6) the local administration is to provide the start-up capital, define objectives and policy, approve the documents of constitution, exercise supervision, monitor management results and cover any social costs which may arise.

13 Article 25 of Law No 142/90 makes express provision for the joint management of one or more services through the creation of consortia, in accordance with the provisions on special undertakings laid down in Article 23. For that purpose, each municipal council must approve, by absolute majority, a consortium agreement and at the same time the statutes of the consortium (consorzio). The general meeting of the consortium is to be composed of the representatives of its member entities (the mayor, the council chairman or their deputies). The general meeting elects the board of management and approves the documents of constitution prescribed by the statutes.

B - AGAC

14 Azienda Gas-Acqua Consorziale (`AGAC') is a consortium set up by a number of municipalities in the province of Reggio Emilia to manage energy and environmental services, pursuant to Article 25 of Law No 142/90. Under Article 1 of its statutes (`the Statutes'), it has legal personality and operational autonomy.

15 Article 3(1) of the Statutes states that the object of AGAC is to assume direct responsibility for, and manage, the public services listed, which include the production and distribution of methane gas and heating for civil and industrial purposes. Article 3(2) provides that AGAC may extend its activities to other related or ancillary services. Under Article 3(3) it may create, or hold shares or have interests in, public or private companies or public bodies (enti) for the management of related or ancillary activities. Under Article 3(4) the consortium may provide the abovementioned services to municipalities, private persons or public bodies which do not belong to the consortium.

16 Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the Statutes specify, among other things, the percentage participation of each member municipality in the general meeting of the consortium, and in the consortium's profits and losses. In accordance with Article 10(3), the percentage participation of the Municipality of Viano is set at 0.9%.

17 Under Articles 12 and 13 of the Statutes, the most important managerial acts, which include preparation of budgets and accounts, must be approved by the general meeting of the consortium, which is composed of representatives of the member municipalities. (9)

18 Article 25 of the Statutes, entitled `Management criteria', provides that AGAC must achieve a balanced budget and operational profitability.

19 In accordance with Article 27, the municipalities provide AGAC with funds and assets, in respect of which it pays them annual interest.

20 Pursuant to Article 28, any profits in a given financial year may be allocated to various purposes as decided by the general meeting: in particular, they may be distributed between the member municipalities of the consortium, retained by the consortium to establish or increase reserve funds or reinvested in other AGAC activities.

21 Under Article 29, where a loss occurs the financial deficit may be corrected through, in particular, the injection of new capital by the municipalities.

IV - The facts and the question referred for a preliminary ruling

22 By its Decision No 18 of 24 May 1997 (`the Decision'), the Municipal Council of Viano entrusted to AGAC management of the heating installations of a number of municipal buildings and the supply of the necessary fuel. It also made the consortium responsible for carrying out improvements to heating installations located in the buildings in question. (10) It did not, however, issue any invitation to tender to interested businesses.

23 AGAC's remuneration was fixed at ITL 122 million for the period from 1 June 1997 to 31 May 1998. The value of the fuels to be supplied represented ITL 86 million while that of management and maintenance of the installations represented ITL 36 million.

24 Article 2 of the Decision provides that, on the expiry of the (one-year) period of management, AGAC undertakes to continue providing the service for a further period of three years, at the request of the municipality and following modification of the conditions set out in the Decision. Provision is also made for subsequent extension. (11)

25 Teckal Srl (`Teckal') is a private company operating in the heating services sector. It supplies private persons and public bodies in particular with heating oil which it purchases beforehand from producers. It also services oil-operated and gas-operated heating installations. Before those services were entrusted to AGAC, Teckal had provided them under a contract with the Municipality of Viano.

26 Teckal brought proceedings against the Municipality of Viano and AGAC before the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per l'Emilia-Romagna, Sezione di Parma, seeking the annulment of the Decision of the Municipal Council of Viano. It contended that the municipality should have followed the procedures for the award of contracts required under Community legislation.

27 The national court first posed the question as to which of Directive 92/50 and Directive 93/36 was applicable in the action pending before it. It was of the opinion that the threshold of ECU 200 000 laid down in both directives was, in any event, exceeded.

28 In view of the fact that AGAC was entrusted, first, with providing various services and, second, with supplying fuel, the national court formed the view that it could not rule out that Article 6 of Directive 92/50 applied. More specifically, it considered that the composite nature of the management operation entrusted to AGAC and the strictly complementary nature of the activities of (a) operation and maintenance, which fell under the heading of services, and (b) supplying fuel made it impossible to say that one was ancillary to the other and to hold that Article 6 of Directive 92/50 was not relevant, or to interpret that article precisely.

29 The national court concluded that, in order for the action pending before it to be decided, it was necessary to interpret Article 6 of Directive 92/50 by way of a preliminary ruling and to settle in that way the question whether, in directly placing the contract with AGAC, the municipality was released from the obligation to observe the award procedure laid down by the directive, on the basis of the derogation contained in that article.

30 In addition, the national court raised the question of the compatibility with the provisions of the Treaty of the exclusive right to provide the `heating service' granted to AGAC by Article 3 of the Statutes in the light of Articles 22 to 25 of Law No 142/90, given that Article 6 of Directive 92/50 provides, among other conditions for its applicability, that national provisions granting an exclusive right must be compatible with the Treaty.

31 In those circumstances, the national court stayed proceedings and referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling a question on the interpretation of Article 6 of Directive 92/50 from the points of view set out in the grounds of its order for reference.

V - My views on the case

A - Admissibility

32 AGAC considers that an issue of admissibility arises because the question referred by the national court essentially concerns the interpretation of provisions of national law. (12) It further contends that Article 6 of Directive 92/50 cannot be applicable since its applicability presupposes the existence of a public service contract. That is not the case here, because the reason for entrusting the provision of the services to AGAC lies in the relationship of subordination between that consortium and one of its member municipalities. The municipality concerned did not entrust to a third party the service consisting in the management of heating installations, but chose a different way of organising the direct management of that service.

33 The Austrian Government also raises the issue of admissibility on the ground that the order for reference does not contain a question referred for a preliminary ruling. It maintains that in the field of public procurement law it is particularly important that questions should be formulated precisely, because otherwise it is impossible to adopt a view on the particular problem of interpretation confronting the national court.

34 First of all, it must be borne in mind that it is for the national court, which has a better and fuller knowledge of the facts of the case, to decide whether it is necessary to make a reference to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling and to determine which provisions of Community legislation need to be interpreted so as to enable it to give judgment in the action pending before it. (13)

35 However, in the context of Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC) the Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to rule either on the interpretation of national laws or regulations or on their conformity with Community law. (14) It can only supply the national court with a ruling on the interpretation of Community law to enable that court to resolve the legal problem before it. (15)

36 In my view, the basic problem posed by this case is the vagueness with which the national court's question is formulated. That vagueness does not, however, render the question inadmissible. The Court has held that, in the context of the procedure provided for in Article 177, where questions are formulated imprecisely it may extract from all the information provided by the national court and from the documents concerning the main proceedings the provisions of Community law which require interpretation, having regard to the subject-matter of those proceedings. (16)

37 In addition the Court, on each occasion for the purpose of giving the national court a useful answer, has interpreted provisions whose interpretation was not requested by the national court (17) or has reformulated the questions referred and thus deduced the provisions which it is for the Court to interpret. (18)

38 However, before establishing the issue whose consideration will be helpful to the national court, it is necessary to examine a further issue raised by AGAC regarding the admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling. AGAC contends that the value of the contract is below the threshold of ECU 200 000 laid down in the Community provisions and that the Community legislation on the matter therefore cannot apply. (19)

39 The national court took the view that the subject-matter of the dispute before it, whether from the point of view of a contract for the provision of services (heating) or from that of a contract for the supply of goods (fuel), exceeded the threshold of ECU 200 000 laid down in the Community legislation in order for public service and public supply contracts to be caught by Directives 95/20 and 93/36 respectively. More specifically, it considered that this was so because the contract was, in the first case, a contract for services of indefinite duration (20) and, in the second, a supply contract with an express option clause. (21)

40 In my opinion, the Court of Justice has jurisdiction to indicate to the national court the method to be used for calculating the value of the contract in accordance with Community legislation. That method is laid down in Article 7 of Directive 92/50 and Article 5 of Directive 93/36. The application of those provisions to a specific case is a matter for the national court, (22) which is aware both of the content of the contractual terms and of the conditions under which the contract may be extended beyond expiry of the one-year period of management.

41 It follows from the above that the Court of Justice is not empowered to substitute its own appraisal for that of the national court as regards the question whether the threshold fixed by the Community legislature is actually exceeded, but must restrict itself to the factual situation as described by the national court and the assessments made by it. To do otherwise would entail the Court itself determining the value of the contract at issue, a step alien to the role assigned to it under Article 177, which does not involve review of the content of an order for reference but cooperation and dialogue with the national court.

B - Reformulation of the question referred for a preliminary ruling

42 In order, therefore, to provide the national court with a useful answer, it is in my view necessary to reformulate its question in the light of the subject-matter of the dispute and the information contained in the order for reference.

43 One point needs to be established clearly at the outset. Article 2 of Directive 92/50 (23) provides that, if a public contract is intended to cover both products within the meaning of Directive 77/62 (now Directive 93/36) and services within the meaning of Directive 92/50, it will fall within the scope of the latter if the value of the services in question exceeds that of the products also covered by the contract. This provision is designed to prevent mixed contracts (covering both services and supplies) from being subject to two different sets of rules and therefore means that the contract as a whole is awarded in accordance with only one of them. That is to say, it makes financial value the determining factor as regards which legislation is applicable. Thus, the award of a mixed contract falls within the scope of Directive 92/50 if the value of the services exceeds that of the goods supplied. (24) If, on the other hand, the value of the goods exceeds that of the services involved, Directive 93/36 must be applied to the award of the entire contract. (25)

44 In other words, it is clear from the above analysis that it is important to settle the question as to what constitutes the object of the contract. If the contract concerned is a mixed contract, that is to say one relating both to products and to services, it is important to establish whether the value of the goods supplied is greater than that of the services, in accordance with the criterion of financial value laid down for determining which legislation is applicable.

45 In the case in point, it is apparent from the order for reference that, by a single measure, AGAC was entrusted both with the provision of certain services and with the supply of certain products. (26) It is also apparent that the value of the products to be supplied is manifestly greater than that of the services. I am therefore of the view that the Community provisions whose interpretation would assist the national court are those of Directive 93/36, not Article 6 of Directive 92/50 as mentioned in the order for reference. Consequently, an answer to the question as drafted would not, in my opinion, be helpful in disposing of the case pending before the national court.

46 Bearing in mind the subject-matter of the dispute and the analysis contained in the order for reference, the national court is asking essentially, whether, in directly entrusting the heating service and the supply of fuel to AGAC, the Municipality of Viano is subject to an obligation to observe the procedure provided for under Directive 93/36. In other words, the question to be answered is whether Directive 93/36 precludes a local authority from entrusting the supply of products directly to a consortium of which it is a member, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, without having observed the tendering procedure provided for under that directive.

47 The national court may, nevertheless, possibly consider that an interpretation of Treaty provisions is also necessary, in order to establish whether they preclude the exclusive right to provide heating services which, it asserts, is conferred on AGAC by Article 3 of the Statutes, viewed in the light of Articles 22 and 25 of Italian Law No 142/90. However, it is not clear from the order for reference whether the relevant national provisions, principally Articles 22 and 25 of Law No 142/90 and Article 3 of the Statutes, permit the acts which constitute the subject-matter of the Viano Municipal Council's decision to be entrusted directly to AGAC. (27) It is for the national court to decide that issue and, if it considers it necessary, to make a reference for a preliminary ruling on the subject.

C - Substance

48 Directive 93/36 is essentially intended to ensure development of effective competition in the field of public supply contracts. (28) That is to say, in selecting the person with which it is to conclude in writing a contract for pecuniary interest involving the supply, in whatever form, of a certain product, a contracting authority is required to apply the procedure guaranteeing effective/free competition which is established by Directive 93/36.

49 Also, it should be made clear from the outset that Directive 93/36 does not contain a provision analogous to Article 6 of Directive 92/50, that is to say it makes no provision for an exemption from the obligation to apply the tendering procedure where a public supply contract is awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority, on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision compatible with the Treaty. Since no such exemption is provided for, (29) it makes no difference for the purpose of applying the directive whether or not it is a private person who, as a supplier, enters into a contract with a contracting authority. That conclusion is, in my view, to be inferred from the system laid down by the directive. (30)

50 Under Article 1(a), for the purpose of Directive 93/36 `public supply contracts' are `contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing involving the purchase, lease[,] rental or hire purchase, with or without option to buy, of products between a supplier (a natural or legal person) and one of the contracting authorities defined in (b) below'. The conditions which must be met in order for Directive 93/36 to apply follow from this provision.

51 First, the contractual relationship must concern the supply of products. The element of the supply of certain products is a basic condition for application of the directive.

52 Second, a contract must be drawn up (31) and, in particular, must be concluded in writing. The contract is synallagmatic and for pecuniary interest. This means that the directive is applicable where, first, there is a concordance of wills between two different persons, the contracting authority and the supplier, and, second, the commercial relationship that is created consists in the supply of a product for pecuniary remuneration. (32) In other words, there are mutual acts of performance, the creation of rights and obligations for the parties to the contract and interdependence of their respective acts of performance. (33)

53 Third - an element directly linked to the preceding one - the party entering into the contract with the contracting authority, namely the supplier, must have real third-party status vis-à-vis that authority, that is to say the supplier must be a separate person from the contracting authority. This element, likewise, is an essential characteristic for the conclusion of supply contracts falling within the scope of Directive 93/36.

54 It follows from the above that the directive does not apply where the contracting authority has recourse to its own resources for the supply of the products it wants. (34) Community law does not require contracting authorities to observe the procedure ensuring effective competition between interested parties where those authorities wish to take on themselves the supply of the products they need. (35)

55 AGAC maintains that the Municipality of Viano did not entrust the service of managing heating installations to a third party but merely decided to organise the direct management of that service in a different manner, by having recourse to the structure and staff of a special entity established for that purpose rather than its own structure and staff.

56 First, it is in my view beyond doubt, according to the information supplied by the national court, that the case in point (also) involves the supply of certain products.

57 Second, in order for it to be possible for the directive to apply there must be a written contract which lays down the rights and obligations of the parties and, more particularly, regulates the matter of remuneration. In other words, the national court must establish whether a contract was concluded, in writing, regulating the relationship between the contracting authority and the supplier and specifying the rights and obligations of the parties, in addition to the decision of the Viano Municipal Council entrusting the task concerned to AGAC. (36)

58 Also, if a written contract was concluded it is for the national court to establish whether the possibility of renewing the contract afforded to the Municipality of Viano was the result of negotiations between the latter and AGAC. It is likewise for the national court to establish whether the remuneration fixed for the supply of goods and the provision of services to the municipality was determined on the basis of prevailing commercial practice. (37) Whether or not there actually is a contract governed by Community legislation depends on the answers given by the national court to the foregoing questions.

59 In addition, as is made clear by the national court, the situation is one which involves two formally separate persons operating in the market. This element is important because a situation where a municipality, in the interests of improved internal organisation of its services, entrusted supply to one of its units would constitute a form of internal delegation that remained within its own administrative ambit. (38) In those circumstances, the relationship between the Municipality of Viano and AGAC could not be regarded as a public contract within the meaning of Directive 93/36.

60 More specifically, under the national legislation AGAC, which has legal personality and enjoys operational autonomy, is a consortium (consorzio) of municipalities which was set up on the basis of Article 25 of Italian Law No 142/90. That article makes express provision for the joint management of one or more services through the creation of consortia in accordance with the provisions governing special undertakings referred to in Article 23 of the same Law, as stated above in point 13. In addition, AGAC must perform the functions entrusted to it by the municipalities belonging to the consortium and is subject to control by them.

61 Under Article 10(3) of the Statutes, the Municipality of Viano's percentage participation in the general meeting of AGAC and hence, in reality, both in the administration and in the profits and losses of the consortium, stands at 0.9%. In my view it is therefore unlikely (and the same also appears to be the case from the facts as presented by the national court) that, in the case of AGAC, a consortium set up by 45 municipalities in the province of Reggio Emilia and having separate legal personality, it could be maintained that the Municipality of Viano exercises over that consortium the kind of control which an entity exercises over an internal body.

62 Furthermore, under Article 3(4) of the Statutes AGAC may provide certain services (39) to municipalities, private persons or public bodies (enti) which do not belong to the consortium.

63 Consequently, despite the possibility for the Municipality of Viano, under the Decision, to extend the contract at its request, I do not consider it proven that the municipality exercises hierarchical control over AGAC or that the relationship between it and AGAC does not entail the award of a contract on the ground that the two contracting parties do not in reality have third-party status with respect to each other. (40)

64 If, on the basis of the findings which it must make, the national court concludes that the relationship between the municipality and AGAC is the outcome of the concordance of two autonomous wills representing separate legal interests in a manner consistent with the customary form of relationship that characterises the contractual relationship of two separate persons, (41) a conclusion which can also be inferred from a study of the contractual conditions, (42) the entrusting of the supply which constitutes the subject-matter of this case falls within the scope of Directive 93/36.

65 To accept that is possible for contracting authorities to have recourse, for the supply of goods, to separate entities over which they maintain either absolute or relative control, in breach of the relevant Community legislation, would open the floodgates for forms of evasion contrary to the objective of ensuring free and undistorted competition which the Community legislature seeks to achieve through the coordination of procedures for the award of public supply contracts.

66 Subject to the abovementioned reservations concerning the points to be clarified by the national court, the procedure laid down in Directive 93/36 should, consequently, be observed. This means that in selecting its contractual partner the municipality should comply with the provisions aimed at safeguarding competition, with no exception permitted even if it regards AGAC as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/36, because, as I stated earlier in this Opinion, that directive makes no provision, as regards the conclusion of public supply contracts with other contracting authorities, for a derogation comparable to that contained in Article 6 of Directive 92/50.

67 In my view, therefore, it follows from the foregoing considerations that Directive 93/36 permits no exception to the procedure it lays down where a public supply contract is concluded, irrespective of whether the contract is concluded between a contracting authority and an entity which is also a contracting authority. Accordingly, subject to the points which the national court must establish, the entrusting of the contested supply to the consortium is in breach of the directive in question if the relationship between the local authority and the consortium to which it belongs constitutes the outcome of a concordance of wills of two different, essentially autonomous, persons representing separate legal interests.

VI - Conclusion

68 In the light of the foregoing analysis, I propose that the Court should give the following answer to the question referred to it by the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale per l'Emilia-Romagna, Sezione di Parma:

Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts requires the procedure which it lays down to be observed where a contract for pecuniary interest is concluded in writing for the supply of products, irrespective of whether the contract is concluded between entities which are contracting authorities.

(2) - Specifically, Article 7(5) provides that the basis for calculation shall be, in the case of fixed-term contracts of 48 months or less, the total contract value for its duration and, in the case of contracts of indefinite duration or with a term of more than 48 months, the monthly instalment multiplied by 48.

(5) - The same provision goes on to explain that `a body governed by public law' means any body (a) established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, (b) having legal personality, and (c) financed, for the most part, by the State, regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

(6) - More specifically, Titles II, III and IV and Articles 6 and 7.

(7) - Article 5(2) provides that, in the case of contracts for the lease, rental or hire purchase of products, the basis for calculating the estimated contract value is to be: (a) in the case of fixed-term contracts, where their term is 12 months or less the total contract value for its duration or, where their term exceeds 12 months, its total value including the estimated residual value, and (b) in the case of contracts for an indefinite period or in cases where there is doubt as to the duration of the contracts, the monthly value multiplied by 48. Also, Article 5(3) provides that, in the case of regular contracts or of contracts which are to be renewed within a given time, the estimated contract value is to be established on the basis of either (a) the actual aggregate value of similar contracts concluded over the previous fiscal year or 12 months, adjusted, where possible, for anticipated changes in quantity or value over the 12 months following the initial contract, or (b) the estimated aggregate value during the 12 months following the first delivery or during the term of the contract, where this is greater than 12 months. Lastly, Article 5(5) provides that, in the case where a proposed procurement specifies option clauses, the basis for calculating the estimated contract value is to be the highest possible total of the purchase, lease, rental or hire purchase permissible, inclusive of the option clauses.

(8) - Ordinamento delle Autonomie Locali (GURI No 135 of 12 June 1990).

(9) - In accordance with Article 8, apart from the general meeting the other organs of the consortium are the board of management, the chairman of the board of management and the general manager. They are not answerable to the consortium's member municipalities for their managerial acts. The natural persons who constitute these organs do not exercise any functions within the member municipalities.

(10) - Article 1 of the Decision, entitled `Matters for management', enumerates the tasks entrusted to AGAC.

(11) - This is possible subject to a request being communicated to AGAC at least three months before the expiry of the period concerned.

(12) - More specifically, AGAC considers that the national court is asking the Court of Justice to decide whether the management of a municipality's heating installations can be classed as a public service of a local nature within the meaning of Article 22 of Law No 142/90, so as to enable it to determine whether or not Article 6 of Directive 92/50 is applicable. According to AGAC, the national court is essentially asking whether or not provisions of national law (Articles 23 and 25 of Law No 142/90) involve the award of a public service contract to a body which is itself a contracting authority.

(13) - See, for example, Case 83/78 Pigs Marketing Board v Redmond [1978] ECR 2347, paragraph 25, and Case C-343/90 Lourenço Dias v Director da Alfândega do Porto [1992] ECR I-4673, paragraph 15.

(14) - See, for example, Case 77/72 Capolongo v Maya [1973] ECR 611, paragraph 8, and Lourenço Dias, cited above, paragraph 19.

(15) - See, for example, Case C-17/92 Distribuidores Cinematograficos v Spanish State [1993] ECR I-2239, paragraph 8, and, less recently, Case 9/74 Casagrande v Landeshauptstadt München [1974] ECR 773, paragraph 4.

(16) - See, for example, Case C-168/95 Arcaro [1996] ECR I-4705, paragraph 20 and, in particular, paragraph 21, and Case 251/83 Haug-Adrion v Frankfurter Versicherungs-AG [1984] ECR 4277, paragraph 9.

(17) - See, for example, Case 70/77 Simmenthal v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato [1978] ECR 1453, paragraph 57, Case C-114/91 Claeys [1992] ECR I-6559, paragraphs 10 and 11, and Case C-280/91 Viessmann [1993] ECR I-971, paragraph 17.

(18) - See, for example, Case C-381/89 Sindesmos Melon tis Eleftheras Evangelikis Ekklisias and Others [1992] ECR I-2111, paragraph 19 et seq., and Case 38/77 Enka v Inspecteur der Invoerrechten en Accijnzen [1977] ECR 2203.

(19) - More specifically, it submits that the price of the fuel should be deducted from the amount corresponding to the services, inasmuch as AGAC, which is a contracting authority, acquires its fuel through public tendering procedures. It further contends that the contract in question is not one of indefinite duration. This is because renewal of the contract upon expiry of the initial period is at the absolute discretion of the municipality, subject to an obligation to specify the financial terms and conditions. Lastly, an aggregate value was fixed for the period from 1 June 1997 to 31 May 1998, and that, it contends, also precludes classifying the contract as one of indefinite duration. The latter conclusion is also confirmed by the fact that the contract at issue terminated definitively on 31 May 1998, since the Municipality of Viano decided to provide for the operation of the service by other means.

(20) - The national court explains in the order for reference that, according to Article 2 of the Decision of the Municipal Council of Viano, upon expiry of its (one-year) management period AGAC undertook to continue to provide the service concerned for a period of three further years, if so requested by the authority, after updating of the conditions laid down in the Decision. The national court also pointed out that the same applied to subsequent periods, provided that any such request was notified to AGAC at least three months before the expiry of the relevant period.

(21) - The national court explains that, if on the other hand supplies are the main component, the updating of the conditions provided for would mean that AGAC was entitled to adjustment of the consideration in line with the market price of the fuel to be supplied, an operation which, being automatic, did not exclude the possibility that the municipality had a genuine option. Consequently, the national court concludes, such a case falls within the scope of Article 5(5) of Directive 93/36, in accordance with which, where a proposed procurement specifies option clauses, the basis for calculating the estimated value must be the highest possible total of the purchase permissible, inclusive of the option clauses.

(22) - There is no reason, in theory, why the national court should not refer a question for a preliminary ruling on this if it encounters difficulties of interpretation.

(23) - Interpreted in the light of Article 33 of Directive 93/36.

(24) - See also M. Mensi, `L'ouverture à la concurrence des marchés publics de services', No 3/1993 Revue du Marché Unique Européen, pp. 59-86, paragraph 8.

(25) - In its judgment in Case C-331/92 Gestion Hotelera Internacional [1994] ECR I-1329 the Court, basing its reasoning on the 16th recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50, according to which `it follows from Directive 71/305 that, for a contract to be a public works contract, its object must be the achievement of a work', held (paragraph 29) that `a mixed contract relating both to the performance of works and to the assignment of property does not fall within the scope of Directive 71/305 if the performance of the works is merely incidental to the assignment of property'. Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerned the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682). Furthermore, the 16th recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50, which refers expressly to the object of the contract, states that `in so far as these works are incidental rather than the object of the contract, they do not justify treating the contract as a public works contract'. Lastly, in Gestion Hotelera Internacional the Court pointed out (paragraph 28 of its judgment): `It is for the national court to determine whether the works are incidental to the main object of the award'.

(26) - This is clear from Article 1 of the Decision of the Municipal Council of Viano, which the referring court quotes in full.

(27) - Teckal denies that these provisions can be interpreted to that effect and points out that, during the five years preceding the grant of the contract to AGAC, it had itself been a contractual partner of the Municipality of Viano.

(28) - See the 14th recital in the preamble to Directive 93/36.

(29) - This difference reflects a special feature of the field regulated by Directive 92/50, in the sense that due account has to be taken of the fact that services may be provided in the context of stable legal relations and ties between separate bodies (collectivités) in accordance with a system of cooperation where one body is subordinate to the other. Furthermore, Council Directive

93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 84), in addition to containing a provision (Article 11) analogous to Article 6 of Directive 92/50, includes another similar provision on this question which takes account of the particular case of entities which are undertakings classed as contracting authorities only in connection with service contracts in specific sectors. The provision in question is Article 13, concerning service contracts awarded by a contracting authority to an `affiliated undertaking', which is defined by reference to a relationship of control and to dominant influence between a contracting entity and the undertaking or (in certain circumstances) between undertakings (Article 1(3)); in other words, this relates to legal entities which belong to the same economic unit (see also M. Mensi, op. cit., paragraph 18, p. 81 et seq.).

(30) - It may be noted that the Court found that a Member State failed to fulfil its obligations under the directives coordinating procedures for the award of both public works contracts (Directive 71/305) and public supply contracts (Directive 77/62) when it excluded from the scope of national rules on public procurement transactions effected by the administrative authorities with private persons in cases where those directives did not authorise such exemption. See the judgment in Case C-71/92 Commission v Spain [1993] ECR I-5923, paragraphs 10, 11 and 22. In particular, the Court stated (paragraph 10) that `the only permitted exceptions to the application of Directive 77/62 are those which are exhaustively and expressly mentioned therein'.

(31) - It is significant that the eighth recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50 states that the `provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts;... the provision of services on other bases, such as law or regulations, or employment contracts, is not covered'. In other words, Directive 92/50 applies only if the legal relationship between the contracting parties is a service contract for the purposes of Article 1(a) of the directive and does not apply where the provision of services is not based on a contract; see also point 26 of the Opinion of Advocate General La Pergola in Case C-360/96 Arnhem and Reden v BFI Holding [1998] ECR I-6821 and point 49 of the Opinion of Advocate General Alber in Case C-108/98 R.I.SAN. v Comune di Ischia and Others [1999] ECR I-5219.

(32) - This element of fixing the remuneration in abstract terms in the case of the award of a public supply contract is highlighted in the judgment in Case C-272/91 Commission v Italy [1994] ECR I-1409, at paragraph 25; the case concerned the concession for the computerisation system for the Italian lottery, that is to say the supply of an integrated computerisation system for the lottery which involved, in particular, the supply of certain goods to the State. The same element involving payment of a specified consideration to remunerate the service provider is also highlighted in paragraph 25 of the judgment in BFI Holding, cited above.

(33) - On this important element of the concept of a contract, see A. de Laubadère, F. Moderne and P. Delvolvé, Traité des contrats administratifs, volume 1 (1983, 2nd ed., 808 pp.), paragraph 14 et seq., p. 29 et seq.

(34) - A form of supply referred to as `in-house'. On this question in connection with Directive 92/50, see P. Flamme and M.-A. Flamme, `Les marchés publics de services et la coordination de leurs procédures de passation (Directive 92/50/ECC du 18 juin 1992)', Revue du Marché commun et de l'Union européenne (1993) No 365, pp. 150-170, paragraphs 15 and 16. See also M. Mensi, op. cit., paragraph 5.

(35) - A similar question has already been raised before the Court in connection with the interpretation of Directive 92/50. In the BFI Holding case (cited in footnote 31 above), concerning a dispute between two Dutch municipalities and a private undertaking (BFI) which was claiming that the award of a contract involving refuse collection to a public limited company (ARA) established for that purpose by the municipalities in question was subject to the procedure laid down by the directive, the national court took the view that ARA fell within the exception provided for in Article 6 of Directive 92/50 in so far as it was to be regarded as a body governed by public law within the meaning of Article 1(b) of that directive.

In point 38 of his Opinion in BFI Holding, Advocate General La Pergola reached the conclusion that `there is no "third party" element, that is to say no essential distinction between ARA and the two municipalities, in the present case. What is involved here is a form of inter-departmental delegation that remains within the administrative ambit of the municipalities. In assigning the activities in question to ARA, the municipalities had absolutely no intention of privatising the functions they themselves had previously performed in this sector'. Furthermore, this issue of whether public services are provided by a part of the public administration, in which case there is no public contract within the meaning of Directive 92/50, was also highlighted by Advocate General Alber in his Opinion in RI.SAN., cited in footnote 31 above; see point 49 of that Opinion.

Advocate General La Pergola concluded that `in short,... the relationship between the municipalities and ARA cannot be regarded as a contract within the meaning of the Directive' (the directive in question being Directive 92/50). However, Advocate General La Pergola was of the opinion that an entity of this type (such as ARA) constitutes a body governed by public law within the meaning of Directive 92/50. The Court examined the issue of when a body can be classed as having the status of a body governed by public law within the meaning of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 and supplied the national court with the ruling that it needed on the interpretation of that provision.

(36) - It is apparent from the order for reference that AGAC is required to manage the heating service mainly on the basis of the instructions contained in the Decision, which were issued unilaterally by the Municipality of Viano.

(37) - I do not consider that there can be any question of the award of a contract and procurement for the purposes of the directive if, first, the remuneration mentioned in the Decision was not freely fixed on the basis of an offer tendered by AGAC within the context of its operational autonomy and, second, that offer lacks any profit-making character, as indeed the Commission maintains.

(38) - It should be noted that, as Teckal points out, the services in question were previously provided by it for five years under a contract with the Municipality of Viano.

(39) - Including, it may be recalled, the production and distribution of methane gas and heating for civil and industrial purposes.

(40) - The Commission considers (paragraph 34 of its written observations) that the case in point involves a special mode of organisation whereby the municipality, in order to obtain a particular supply of goods or provision of services, does not turn to the market but has recourse to a body that can be described as emanating from itself (it constitutes a longa manus) in the specific sector concerned.

(41) - In other words, it must be established whether the contractual conditions laid down were the subject of prior negotiations.

(42) - Such as the inclusion of penalty clauses operative in the event of defective performance by AGAC of its obligations, or an arbitration clause, and so forth.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Cosmas delivered on 23 November 1999.
French Republic v Ladbroke Racing Ltd and Commission of the European Communities.
Appeal - Competition - State aid.
Case C-83/98 P.

I - Introduction

1. In the present appeal, the French Republic seeks the setting aside of the judgment of the Court of First Instance of 27 January 1998 in Case T-67/94. The contested judgment was given following an application by Ladbroke Racing Ltd for the annulment of Commission Decision 93/625/EEC. That decision was concerned with the classification of a number of measures adopted by the French authorities which Ladbroke Racing Ltd had complained of to the Commission, claiming that they fell within Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty. The following two issues are among those raised by the present appeal: first, there is the question of the breadth of the judicial review conducted by the Court of First Instance when it assesses a determination by the Commission as to whether or not a national measure amounts to (unlawful) State aid; second, the Court of Justice is asked to rule on the conditions under which the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations may be relied on and applied so as to limit the obligation to recover unlawfully granted aid.

II - Facts and procedure

2. The facts of the case are set out in detail in paragraphs 1 to 36 of the contested judgment.

3. It is common ground that on 7 April 1989 Ladbroke Racing Ltd (a company incorporated under English law whose activities include organising and providing betting services in connection with horse-races in the United Kingdom and elsewhere in the European Union; hereinafter Ladbroke), jointly with six other companies in the Ladbroke Group, submitted a complaint to the Commission in respect of a number of measures which had been adopted by the French Government in favour of the Pari Mutuel Urbain (hereinafter the PMU). The PMU is an economic interest group (groupement d'intérêt économique) consisting of the principal racecourse undertakings, with exclusive rights in relation to racecourse organisation and to management of the totalisator betting rights of the racecourse undertakings in France.

4. On 22 September 1993 the Commission adopted Decision 93/625, in which it found that three of the seven measures adopted by the French Government for the benefit of the PMU constituted State aid under Article 92(1) of the Treaty but qualified for exemption under Article 92(3)(c) thereof. In the case of the other four measures, the Commission decided that the conditions for applying Article 92(1) were not met.

5. Ladbroke brought an action before the Court of First Instance for the annulment of Decision 93/625. The French Republic applied for leave to intervene in support of the Commission, which was granted by order of the President of the Second Chamber of the Court of First Instance of 30 August 1994.

6. The Court of First Instance found errors of law and of fact in certain points of the Commission decision challenged before it, of which the following five present particular interest:

- first, the point where it was found that, in so far as the amounts resulting from winnings which are not claimed by bettors have always been regarded as normal resources, those amounts form part of the non-public levies, and that their use to finance social security expenditure together with monitoring and supervision costs, horse-breeding incentives and investment connected with the organisation of horse-racing and totalisator betting cannot be regarded as State aid, since the State resources criterion is not met (Parts IV and V, point 1, of the decision);

- second, the Court of First Instance focused criticism on the point in the Commission decision relating to the legal classification of the national measures which changed the allocation of the public levies. The Commission had found that the tax arrangements applicable to horse-races were the responsibility of the Member States; increases or reductions in the rate of tax did not constitute fiscal aid provided that they applied uniformly to all the undertakings concerned. There was State aid, therefore, only where a significant reduction in the rate of taxation strengthened the financial situation of an undertaking in a monopoly position. According to the Commission, that was not the case here in so far as the reduction in 1984 in the public levy on bets was limited (some 1.6%) and was subsequently maintained; it was therefore not designed to finance a specific ad hoc operation. The French authorities had acted with the aim of increasing the resources of the recipients of the non-public levies on a permanent basis. The Commission accordingly concluded that, taking account of the special nature of the recipients' situation, the measure in question did not constitute State aid, but a reform in the form of a "tax" adjustment that [was] justified by the nature and economy [sic] of the system in question (Parts IV and V, point 3, of the decision);

- third, the Court of First Instance did not accept that Decision 93/625 was correct at the point where the Commission found that the national measures which granted the PMU cash-flow benefits, consisting in authorisation to defer payment of the public levies, did not constitute a temporary waiving of resources by the public authorities or a specific ad hoc measure, and accordingly could not be classified as State aid (Parts IV and V, point 5, of the decision);

- fourth, the Court of First Instance did not follow the Commission in its reasoning that the one-month delay in the deduction of VAT constituted aid from 1 January 1989 onwards but was offset by a permanent deposit lodged with the Treasury;

- finally, the Court of First Instance considered that the Commission was mistaken in its view that, although the aid consisting in the exemption from the contribution for social housing (hereinafter the housing levy) had been incompatible with the common market from 1989 onwards, it did not have to be refunded as unduly paid because its recipient (the PMU) had entertained legitimate expectations at the time of obtaining it.

7. In view of the foregoing matters the Court of First Instance, by its judgment of 27 January 1998, annulled Commission Decision 93/625 ... in so far as it found that various advantages granted to the PMU, through (a) the amendment in 1985 and 1986 of the allocation of the levies, (b) cash-flow benefits granted to it by the authorisation to defer payment of certain levies on betting, (c) access to unclaimed winnings, and (d) exemption from the one-month delay rule for the deduction of value added tax, after 1 January 1989, do not constitute State aid for the purposes of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty, and also in so far as it decided that the obligation on the French State to require repayment of the aid deriving from the PMU's exemption from the housing levy applies not as from 1989, but as from 11 January 1991.

8. By application lodged on 26 March 1998, the French Government contests the judgment of the Court of First Instance, claiming that it should be set aside. More specifically, it seeks the annulment of the first paragraph of its operative part; in addition, it claims that the form of order sought by the Commission at first instance should be granted and that Ladbroke's application at first instance should be dismissed.

9. On 27 July 1998 Ladbroke brought a cross-appeal contesting the judgment of the Court of First Instance, but withdrew it by document dated 18 January 1999 addressed to the Court of Justice.

III - Grounds of appeal

10. The French Government puts forward two grounds of appeal. The first ground of appeal concerns those points in the contested judgment which resulted in the partial annulment of the Commission decision on the basis that it had incorrectly found that certain of the measures adopted by the

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

French Government in favour of the PMU fell outside the scope of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty. The second ground of appeal relates to the point in the contested judgment where it is found that it was not open to the Commission to rely on the legitimate expectations which may have arisen on the part of the PMU in order to restrict the temporal scope of the obligation on the French authorities to recover one of the items of aid unlawfully granted to it.

A - First ground of appeal

11. This ground, by which it is alleged that Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty was misinterpreted and misapplied, comprises four separate parts which are examined below.

(a) First part of the first ground of appeal (national measure reducing the public levy by 1.6%)

12. The appellant challenges paragraphs 42 to 62 of the contested judgment, where the Court of First Instance found that, contrary to the Commission's assessment, the reduction from 1985 onwards in the share of the revenue from horse-race betting levied by the French State constituted State aid. According to the French Government, the Court of First Instance made a number of errors in law concerning the nature of its review, its understanding of the Commission's decision, the legal classification of the facts and the obligation to give a statement of reasons for judicial decisions.

(i) Scope of the judicial review

13. The Court of First Instance held in the contested judgment (paragraph 52) that the concept of State aid under Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty is objective; therefore, the question as to whether a national measure is to be characterised as State aid is subject to a comprehensive judicial review. In the absence of particular circumstances, which may be due to the complex nature of the State intervention in the economy, it is not, in principle, justified to attribute a broad discretion to the Commission when it determines whether a measure should be characterised as State aid or to restrict the judicial review conducted by the Court of First Instance so that it merely ascertains whether there has been a manifest error of assessment.

14. The appellant submits that the Court of First Instance misdefined the nature and extent of the judicial review which it had been called on to carry out. Ladbroke, on the other hand, maintains that the Court of First Instance was right not to restrict itself to ascertaining whether the Commission had manifestly erred in its assessment but to carry out a comprehensive review of the substance as regards the Commission's views on whether the French measures at issue in favour of the PMU fell within the scope of Article 92(1) of the Treaty.

15. In my view, the Court of First Instance did not err in law in relation to the scope of its review of the relevant determinations by the Commission. It correctly points out in the contested judgment (paragraph 52) that the concept of State aid, as formulated in the Treaty, is purely one of law and is interpreted on the basis of objective factors. Thus, when the Court of Justice, the Court of First Instance and national courts are called on to consider whether or not it is correct to classify a national measure as State aid for the purpose of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty, they must carry out - in principle to the fullest possible extent - a comprehensive review of the substance. That rule is reversed only where the court establishes that there are particular circumstances which prevent an extensive judicial review from being carried out. Those circumstances may consist in the complicated and technical nature of certain assessments which are directly connected with answering the question of law, namely the classification of a measure as State aid. It cannot be maintained that such special circumstances, restricting the opportunity for judicial intervention in the substance of the case, are automatically present whenever the interpretation and application of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty are at issue.

16. It should be noted that the breadth of a court's jurisdiction when it reviews the legality of an administrative measure - such as the measure challenged at first instance - cannot be defined in an absolute and static manner. Apart from the need to adjust the breadth to the facts of each case, a need which exists beyond all doubt, a tendency may be observed in the case-law of the Court of Justice towards a dynamic broadening of judicial review and a strengthening of jurisdiction even in instances where it is necessary to solve complex legal problems with a strong economic flavour such as problems related to competition law. That tendency reflects the basic endeavour of every judicial body - such as the Court of Justice - to ensure that judicial review is carried out as comprehensively as possible in the interests of observing the principle of legality and protecting the rights of the litigants. In conclusion, a comprehensive review as to the substance in cases such as the present one does not, of course, supplant the administrative work of the Commission but constitutes a correct exercise of judicial tasks in a legal order - like the Community legal order - governed by the principle of legality and the rule of law.

(ii) Particular nature of the system of levies on horse-racing as a basis for not categorising the national measure as State aid

17. The French Government considers that the Court of First Instance erred in its assessment of the legality and correctness of the Commission's arguments forming the basis of the latter's decision not to categorise the national measure at issue as (unlawful) State aid. It centres its argument on the failure by the Court of First Instance to take into account that the Commission had based its reasoning on the particular nature and general scheme of the system of levies on horse-racing in France. The particular nature of the system was directly related to three separate criteria which the Commission relied on in order to substantiate its view that the measure was not State aid. The appellant considers that the Court of First Instance entirely ignored the significance of the argument derived from the particular nature of the system at issue, an argument which had been clearly analysed in the pleadings submitted to it by the Commission and the French Government. It adds that the same argument had been taken into account by the Court of Justice in an earlier judgment where it had rejected Ladbroke's claims that the PMU was benefiting from State aid granted by the French Government. In short, the appellant considers that the Court of First Instance misunderstood the grounds of the measure which was being contested before it, failed to assess a material submission which had been duly put before it, or in any event misconstrued the critical issue of the nature and general scheme of the system.

18. The above criticisms by the appellant, which Ladbroke seeks to rebut in its pleadings, call for a number of comments, which I now set out below.

19. First of all, as the appellant acknowledges there are very few express references in the case-law to the nature and general scheme of the system as a criterion for categorising a measure as State aid. In Italy v Commission, which concerned the Italian textile industry, the Court found that the measure before it partially exempted the eligible undertakings from the financial charges arising from the normal application of the general social security system, without there being any justification for this exemption on the basis of the nature or general scheme of this system. The Court did not go on to analyse in greater detail what is or may be included within the concept of the nature and general scheme of a system. In fact, the Court founded its reasoning in Italy v Commission not on that criterion but on the exceptional nature of the national provision at issue in relation to the system which constituted the natural legal situation in some way, while acknowledging at the same time that the particular characteristics of the system, had they been proved, might have justified the relevant divergences from the general rules.

20. The same conclusion is, moreover, reached by Advocate General Darmon in his Opinion in Sloman Neptun. Contrary to the appellant's submissions, the analysis of the Advocate General in that case is centred on what is meant by the exceptional nature of a measure vis-à-vis the general scheme of the overall system in which it is set, as a criterion for finding that there is State aid within the meaning of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty, and not on the nature and general scheme of the system themselves. In other words, neither that Opinion nor the judgment in Italy v Commission contains sufficient guidance as to the significance of the particular characteristics of a system when applying Article 92(1) of the Treaty.

21. The judgment in Tiercé Ladbroke v Commission is of greater interest for the present case. In that judgment, the Court, after describing the logic of the system of levies on totalisator betting (paragraph 34), notes that the system of statutory and fiscal retentions on bets on French horse-races was adopted in the light of the specific regulatory and economic conditions prevailing with regard to horse-racing and totalisator betting in France. There can be no requirement to transpose that system to totalisator betting on Belgian horse-races, which are organised under different regulatory and economic conditions. Moreover, since the levy rates in France and Belgium differ and the application of Belgian rates to bets placed in France is justified for reasons relating to the logic of the totalisator betting system referred to in paragraph 34 of this judgment, that levy cannot, in any event, be shared out between the various recipients on exactly the same basis in the two cases.

22. In that judgment, the Court took account of the particular nature and the general scheme of the system of retentions on totalisator horse-race betting in order to substantiate its position that (i) the differences in the retentions on bets in France and Belgium and (ii) the application of the Belgian rates to bets placed in France on Belgian horse-races were compatible with Community law. It follows, therefore, from that reasoning of the Court that the nature and general scheme of the particular framework within which the national measure at issue is set should be examined. The above view of the Court is all the more important for deciding the present case inasmuch as it was expressed in a judgment which concerned precisely the same legal and factual context as the one at issue here, namely the issue of levies on totalisator horse-race betting in France.

23. I will now examine the individual criticisms made by the appellant of the judgment at first instance. I consider that the Court of First Instance neither ignored nor misconstrued the need to assess the nature and general scheme of the system within which the national measure was set before it concluded that the measure constituted State aid.

24. An initial indication that the Court of First Instance neither failed nor refused to consider the criterion of the nature and general scheme of the system when examining the facts of the case with regard to Article 92(1) of the Treaty is provided by paragraph 76 of the contested judgment. After stating that the tax arrangements applicable to the PMU took into account not only the particular way in which totalisator betting was organised in France but all the characteristic features of French horse-racing, the Court of First Instance held that the Commission was entitled to take the view that the special system of levies, which determines the proportion of betting revenue allocated to the State, the bettors, the PMU and the racecourse undertakings, respectively, did not constitute a derogation from the tax arrangements generally applied to other activities, and that, consequently, the measure concerned had to be evaluated solely in the context of the special tax arrangements applicable to the horse-racing sector. That finding of the Court of First Instance is, of course, not concerned with the specific measure, reducing the public levy by 1.6%, referred to by the French Government in the part of the first ground of appeal now under consideration; it demonstrates, however, that the Court of First Instance is at least aware of the particular features of the legal framework governing public levies on totalisator horse-race betting in France and is willing to take them into account.

25. So far as concerns the specific criticisms of the French Government now under consideration, it is to be noted that its reasoning is founded on an incorrect understanding of the Commission's decision. The Commission did not assess the particular nature of the French system of levies on totalisator horse-race betting in an automatic and vague manner when it decided that the measure reducing the public levies was not State aid; on the contrary, it first applied three criteria from which it derived three propositions - (i) that the measure at issue amounted merely to a limited reduction in the levy rates which does not strengthen the financial situation of an undertaking in a monopoly position; (ii) that the measure was permanent in nature; and (iii) that the measure was not designed to finance a specific ad hoc operation - in order to reach the conclusion that the measure amounted not to State aid but to a reform in the form of a "tax" adjustment that is justified by the nature and economy [sic] of the system in question. Consequently, since the Court of First Instance disputed the interpretative value and correctness of those three criteria in paragraphs 56 to 62 of the contested judgment, it was also correct in disputing the conclusion reached by the Commission that the French measure at issue amounted to a reform in the form of a "tax" adjustment that is justified by the nature and economy [sic] of the system in question.

26. Nor could it have been found that the criterion of the nature and general scheme of the system was separable from the three other abovementioned criteria and capable of independently constituting the legal foundation for the contested finding by the Commission. First, that approach is in direct conflict with the wording of the Commission decision. Second, justification of action by a Member State consisting of vague reliance on the particular character and the nature and general scheme of a system is not in any way a sufficient basis for that action to be taken outside the scope of Article 92(1) of the Treaty. If general arguments of that kind are to be used, there must be a substantive and thorough analysis of the facts of the case which supports the conclusion that those arguments are correct. In other words, if the particular nature and general scheme of the system of levies on totalisator horse-race betting in France could in fact justify, from the point of view of Community competition law, the adoption of a measure such as that at issue, the Commission was obliged to explain with detailed arguments the causal relationship linking the argument as to the particular character of the system and its conclusion that the national measure was not to be categorised as State aid. Since the matters which had been put before the Court of First Instance for its consideration, as set out in the contested judgment, did not include specific and thorough arguments from which it could be clearly demonstrated that the national measure was justified by the nature and general scheme of the system of levies on horse-race betting in France, the decision of that Court, adjudicating on the substance, to regard the reduction in the levy as State aid does not display any error in law.

27. In that regard, there is no foundation in the submission that the Court of First Instance erred because it did not consider the three abovementioned Commission criteria in the light of the particular nature and general scheme of the system of levies on totalisator horse-race betting in France. First, the Court of First Instance did not examine whether those criteria were correct in the abstract but sought to ascertain their practical utility and legal correctness in the specific context of the dispute before it, that is to say in the context of the particular system of public levies on horse-race betting in France; it therefore took account of the nature and particular character of the system. Second, even if it were accepted that additional arguments could have been drawn from the parameter of the nature and general scheme of the system which might have led the Court of First Instance to accept the Commission's reasoning so far as concerns the three criteria adopted by it, again, as indicated above, those arguments had not been placed before the Court of First Instance for its consideration.

28. The French Government considers, furthermore, that even if it were accepted that the Court of First Instance took account of the nature and the general scheme of the system when it assessed whether the views taken by the Commission were lawful, the contested judgment should again be set aside in that regard because the legal classification of the relevant facts was incorrect. The French Government levels criticism at paragraph 58 of the contested judgment, where the Court of First Instance overturned the Commission's reasoning - that the change in the levy rates was not intended to finance a specific operation - and concluded that that change, irrespective of its objective, in fact enabled the PMU to finance operations, and in particular to deal with the costs of computerisation and restructuring necessary for the organisation of its management responsibilities. It also criticises paragraph 59 of the judgment, contending that the Court of First Instance was wrong in its view that the reduction in the rate of the public levy decided on by the French authorities by the adoption of the national measure at issue was not limited in nature.

29. By those submissions the French Government is in reality seeking to contest the findings of the Court of First Instance on the facts. Since the criticisms of the contested judgment are directed at factual appraisals of the court adjudicating on the substance, they must be rejected as inadmissible.

(iii) Contradictory reasoning of the Court of First Instance

30. The appellant contends that the grounds of the contested judgment are contradictory. It refers in particular to paragraph 154 thereof, where the Court of First Instance states that it is apparent from the contested decision that before the PMI was set up in January 1989 there was no trade between France and the other Member States, which means that before that date there was not even competition between the PMU and the other economic operators active on the Community market in bet-taking. The French Government maintains that, since the Court of First Instance made that finding, it also had to hold that no measure which was adopted for the benefit of the PMU before 1989, and in particular the measure waiving part of the public levy in 1985 and 1986, could constitute State aid.

31. That appellant's argument is not correct. As Ladbroke rightly observes, a finding that there was no competition at the time when a national measure favouring certain undertakings was adopted does not necessarily mean that it is not State aid. The requirements for establishing the existence of State aid, which relate to conditions of trade and of the market, must be examined in a dynamic fashion. In other words, it is necessary to take account of likely prospects and developments with regard to inter-State commerce, trade and the conduct of undertakings or consumers and to show the dynamic character of the effects of the conduct under consideration on conditions of competition.

32. That obvious aspect of reviewing whether the requirements of Article 92(1) of the Treaty are met is also recognised by Advocate General Tesauro in his Opinion in Belgium v Commission when he refers to the need to assess, in a dynamic perspective, whether the condition of hindrance to trade (and also that of distortion of competition) exists and to appraise the foreseeable development of the pattern of trade. In the same case, the Court justified its finding as to the existence of State aid within the meaning of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty by stating more specifically that it [was] possible that aid might distort competition within the Community inasmuch as it was... reasonably foreseeable that Tubemeuse [the recipient of the aid] would redirect its activities towards the internal Community market.

33. Having regard to the above, the view of the Court of First Instance concerning State aid as a result of the reduction in the public levy on totalisator horse-race betting in France is entirely correct; its correctness in law is not undermined by the finding in paragraph 154 of the contested judgment that before 1989 there was no competition between the PMU and the other economic operators active on the Community market in bet-taking, nor is it contradictory with that finding.

(b) Second part of the first ground of appeal (cash-flow benefits in favour of the PMU)

34. This part of the first ground of appeal concerns paragraphs 63 to 82 of the contested judgment, where the Court of First Instance held that the Commission had misapplied Article 92(1) of the Treaty in finding that the cash-flow benefits granted by France, which enabled the PMU to defer the payment of certain betting levies, did not constitute (unlawful) State aid. The appellant essentially repeats its complaints connected with the first part of this ground of appeal concerning the scope of judicial review and the failure of the Court of First Instance to assess the particular nature and general scheme of the system of levies on totalisator horse-race betting in France. Those complaints should, however, be rejected for the reasons set out above.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

35. In addition, the French Government criticises paragraphs 79 and 81 of the contested judgment. Those submissions must, however, be rejected.

36. As regards paragraph 79, the French Government maintains that the Court of First Instance was wrong in finding that the contested Commission decision did not contain evidence supporting the conclusion that the change in the rules concerning payment to the Treasury of the public levies did not constitute an ad hoc derogation, but was a general amendment to the tax regime for the entire horse-racing sector and not only for the PMU.

37. The appellant is in reality attempting to induce the Court of Justice to reassess the facts of the case, in order to reverse the position of the Court of First Instance that the national measure at issue constituted an ad hoc provision for the exclusive benefit of the PMU. Its submissions must therefore be rejected as inadmissible in that they fall outside the scope of appellate review. Even if they were interpreted as pleas that the Court of First Instance distorted the content of the Commission decision or did not consider a material submission, they should still be rejected as unfounded. The Court of First Instance was aware of the passages in that decision referred to by the appellant (as is clear from paragraph 31 of the contested judgment), carried out a correct legal assessment of its entire content and concluded that it contained nothing to support the view that the provision in question amounted not to an ad hoc measure but to tax reform of a general nature.

38. In addition, as regards paragraph 81 of the contested judgment, the appellant challenges the view of the Court of First Instance that the Commission had advanced inadequate evidence in support of its position that the State measure at issue was made in the context of the exceptionally heavy taxation of the horse-racing sector, which was considerably higher than in other sectors.

39. The above submission relates to the assessment of matters which are for the Court of First Instance when it adjudicates on the substance and it cannot be examined on appellate review. Thus, this part of the first ground of appeal should be rejected in part as inadmissible and in part as unfounded.

(c) Third part of the first ground of appeal (making unclaimed winnings available to the PMU)

40. In paragraphs 96 to 112 of the contested judgment, the Court of First Instance overturned the Commission's conclusion that the French decree which placed unclaimed horse-race winnings at the disposal of the PMU did not amount to State aid because those sums constituted normal resources and not State resources within the meaning of Article 92(1) of the Treaty.

41. The French Government submits that the contested judgment should be set aside to that extent. The sums in question have always been made available to the racecourse undertakings and the national measure merely altered (widened) the spectrum of possible uses to which they could be put, without there being any question of a transfer of State resources to the PMU. The French Government maintains that, having regard to the particular nature and the general scheme of the horse-race betting system, the revenue which remains available to the racecourse undertakings after the payment of winnings to bettors and deduction of the public levies necessarily constitutes normal resources. The fact that at a given moment the public authorities restrict the use of part of those resources to particular objectives does not convert them from normal resources into State resources. Furthermore, the appellant points out, an undertaking's private funds are not converted into State aid by making their use subject to State regulation.

42. I am unable to accept the above reasoning of the appellant. The latter relies in an unclear and speculative fashion on the particular features and special characteristics which are, in its view, exhibited by the system for allocating the revenue from totalisator horse-race betting in France, in an attempt to overturn the finding of the Court of First Instance that the relevant resources, irrespective of how they are described, were subject to State control and therefore constituted State resources. In paragraphs 105 to 111 of the contested judgment the Court of First Instance sets out in a legally correct manner the justification for its view that the national measure at issue is to be characterised as State aid.

43. More specifically, the Court of First Instance, after noting that the measure at issue enables the racecourse undertakings to cover certain social security costs of the PMU, finds, on the basis of certain criteria, that in France the amount which is collected from the winnings left unclaimed by bettors is under the control of the competent national authorities. Inasmuch as the relevant national provision extended the range of possible uses for those sums to activities of the racecourse undertakings other than those originally envisaged, it follows that all the national legislature did by means of that extension was in effect to waive revenue which would otherwise have been paid to the Treasury, so that, for the same reason, the condition for applying Article 92(1) of the Treaty, namely that State funds are transferred to the recipient, is satisfied in the present case.

44. It should also be noted that the path followed by the Court of First Instance when interpreting the concept of State aid is entirely consistent with the route traced by the Court of Justice in its case-law. It is sufficient to refer to its recent judgment in Piaggio, which demonstrates the breadth of the concept of State aid for the purposes of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty. That concept necessarily implies advantages granted directly or indirectly through State resources or constituting an additional charge for the State or for bodies designated or established by the State for that purpose. It was held in Piaggio that the application of a national rule for placing undertakings under special administration, which allows the undertakings concerned to continue trading, may amount to the grant of State aid where it confers on those undertakings certain advantages which burden the public authorities in the form of a State guarantee, a de facto waiver of public debts, exemption from the obligation to pay fines or other pecuniary penalties, or a reduced rate of tax.

45. In addition, it is stated in Air France, a case relied on by the appellant, that Article 92(1) of the Treaty applies to all the financial means by which the public sector may actually support undertakings, irrespective of whether or not those means are permanent assets of the public sector. Accordingly, the fact that the sums in question, while not held by the State throughout, are continuously subject to its control and therefore to the power of disposal of the competent national authorities is sufficient for them to be characterised as State resources and for the French provision at issue to be brought within the scope of Article 92(1) of the EC Treaty.

46. In conclusion, the submissions put forward by the appellant in the third part of the first ground of appeal are unfounded.

(d) Fourth part of the first ground of appeal

47. This part of the ground of appeal concerns paragraphs 113 to 122 of the contested judgment, where the Court of First Instance finds an error of fact on the part of the Commission. More particularly, when the Commission assessed, from the point of view of Community law, a national measure exempting the racecourse undertakings from the one-month delay rule for the deduction of VAT, it manifestly erred as to the facts in thinking that the system under which a permanent deposit is lodged with the Treasury in order to offset the exemption had existed since 1989 when it had in fact first applied in 1969.

48. The appellant maintains that it was not open to the Court of First Instance to rely on facts relating to the period before 1 January 1989 in deciding whether the Commission's assessment as to the legality of the exemption after 1 January 1989 was correct. In its view, the approach of the Court of First Instance is wrong in law or, in any event, its reasoning at this point is inadequate.

49. As Ladbroke correctly points out, the appellant's objections do not undermine the relevant findings of the Court of First Instance. They relate to the assessment of facts by the latter adjudicating on the substance and are therefore inadmissible. In any event, however, the French Government's criticisms are based on a misunderstanding of the contested judgment. The Court of First Instance did not find that after 1989 the exemption from the one-month delay rule for the deduction of VAT in fact constituted State aid; it merely stated that, by reason of the manifest errors of fact upon which the Commission's reasoning as a whole was based, it was impossible to assess whether those particular arguments were correct in law since they were based on a mistaken factual position. In other words, the Court of First Instance considered that the errors of fact in the Commission decision contested before it made it impossible to examine whether that decision was correct in law. The Court of Justice cannot interfere with that substantive finding by the Court of First Instance, which falls outside the scope of appellate review. Consequently, the final part of the first ground of appeal should be dismissed as inadmissible.

B - Second ground of appeal

(a) Arguments of the parties

50. The appellant challenges paragraphs 179 to 185 of the contested judgment, in particular the finding of the Court of First Instance that, in giving reasons for its decision to limit the temporal scope of the French authorities' obligation to recover the aid unlawfully granted to the PMU, it was not sufficient for the Commission merely to rely on the position adopted by the French authorities regarding the legitimate expectations purportedly entertained by the PMU. More specifically, the Commission had found in its decision that the aid consisting of PMU's exemption from the housing levy as from 1 January 1989 had to be recovered not from that date but from 1 November 1991, the date upon which the procedure under Article 93(2) of the EC Treaty was initiated. It based that finding on the legitimate expectation which the PMU had entertained by reason of a judgment of the French Conseil d'Etat (Council of State) in accordance with which the activities of the racecourse undertakings appeared to be agricultural in nature, thus justifying their exemption from the housing levy. The Commission considered that that judgment could give rise to legitimate expectations on the part of the racecourse undertakings that the exemption was lawful. The Court of First Instance did not follow the above reasoning of the Commission, finding that it is not for the Member State concerned, but for the recipient undertaking, in the context of proceedings before the public authorities or before the national courts to invoke the existence of exceptional circumstances on the basis of which it had entertained legitimate expectations, leading it to decline to repay the unlawful aid.

51. The French Government submits that the view of the Court of First Instance that legitimate expectations cannot be invoked when the Commission exercises its supervisory functions under Article 92 et seq. of the EC Treaty is not consistent with Community law. It relies, first of all, on the wide discretion accorded to the Commission when it assesses national measures from the standpoint of Community law on State aid. It also disputes the correctness of paragraph 182 of the contested judgment in so far as, contrary to the case-law of the Court of Justice, its effect is that observance of the procedure laid down in Article 93 of the Treaty is an absolute requirement in order for legitimate expectations to be invoked. The French Government meets the settled case-law of the Court of Justice that a Member State cannot invoke the expectations of a recipient of aid in order to escape its duty to take the necessary measures to enforce a Commission decision requiring it to recover aid, by relying on Case C-169/95 Spain v Commission, whose effect, in its view, is that a Member State may raise the legitimate expectations of the recipient undertaking in order to challenge the legality of such a Commission decision in judicial proceedings. It seeks to reconcile its interpretation of the judgment in Spain v Commission with the previous case-law in the following way: while the classic prohibition is preserved, preventing a Member State from resorting to the argument as to legitimate expectations in order to refuse to enforce a Commission decision requiring it to recover aid which has been paid unlawfully, that State may nevertheless raise the issue before the Commission; if the latter is not persuaded and adopts a decision requiring repayment of the aid, the Member State must then seek its recovery but at the same time retains the possibility of taking legal proceedings against the Commission decision. Thus - still following the French Government's reasoning - the Court of First Instance wrongly denied the Commission the possibility of examining the submission of a Member State that a recipient of aid entertained a legitimate expectation that the aid was lawful. The French Government adds that the Court of First Instance's position is over-formalistic since it does not allow a timely argument directly related to the question of the recovery of the aid to be examined at the stage when the Commission exercises its supervisory functions.

52. Ladbroke agrees with the reasoning of the Court of First Instance, considering that it alone is compatible with Community law on State aid and the objectives of that law. Ladbroke observes that Spain v Commission, upon which the appellant's line of argument is founded, is fundamentally different from the present case. In that case, the Court of Justice had been called on to decide whether the conduct of Community institutions, in particular the Commission, could be considered to create legitimate expectations on the part of the recipient of unlawfully granted aid; here, however, the conduct which may have given rise to the expectation took place purely at national level. It would thus be wrong to allow the Commission to intervene in a national matter of that kind and to regard such a matter as capable of hindering the application of Community rules on State aid. That would render the procedure under Article 93 of the EC Treaty redundant, in particular the obligation to notify aid. Finally, Ladbroke states that paragraph 182 of the contested judgment is legally correct.

(b) Consideration of the ground of appeal

53. In my view, the question under consideration may be dealt with from two different angles which do not necessarily lead to the same result. The focal point of the analysis which follows is the defining of the (national and/or Community) factors used to determine the scope, and the conditions for application, of the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations.

(i) Legitimate expectations, a dual-natured concept

54. The concept of legitimate expectations in the particular context of the refund of aid which has been paid unlawfully appears to be dual-natured: first, its scope and application are laid down by national law subject to the conditions, and within the framework, specified by Community law; second, the recipient's belief as to the legality of the unlawful aid may be created both by conduct of the national authorities and by that of the Commission.

55. The duality of legitimate expectations is shown by the Court's judgment in Deutsche Milchkontor, which concerned the repayment of unlawful Community aid. In that judgment it is stated:

The first point to be made... is that the principles of the protection of legitimate expectation and assurance of legal certainty are part of the legal order of the Community. The fact that national legislation provides for the same principles to be observed in a matter such as the recovery of unduly paid Community aids cannot, therefore, be considered contrary to that same legal order. Moreover, it is clear from a study of the national laws of the Member States regarding the revocation of administrative decisions and the recovery of financial benefits which have been unduly paid by public authorities that the concern to strike a balance, albeit in different ways, between the principle of legality on the one hand and the principles of legal certainty and the protection of legitimate expectation on the other is common [to] the laws of the Member States.

56. That judgment goes on to state that the legitimate expectations recognised by national law may be relied upon only to the extent that such reliance is consistent with the like-named principle forming part of the Community legal order, account having to be taken of the interests of the Community and the need not to affect the scope and effectiveness of Community law. The above reasoning has also been employed by the Court in relation to the question of the repayment of State aid which is unlawful because it contravenes Articles 92 and 93 of the EC Treaty.

57. There is, however, a fundamental difference between the repayment of Community aid and the recovery of unlawful State aid. State aid is adjudged contrary to Community law because it confers a competitive advantage on the undertaking receiving it and distorts the conditions of free trade. For that reason, its recovery constitutes an imperative need in order to repair the damage to Community law. Community aid, on the other hand, has different objectives (support of a particular economic activity, in the interests of the Community). A finding that aid of that kind is unlawful merely means that the aid did not meet the preconditions for its grant, without the infringement also prejudicing the provisions governing competition. Significant conclusions with direct consequences for the scope of the protection afforded to legitimate expectations may be drawn from the difference set out above. For example, a claim by a recipient of State aid that he is no longer enriched because the benefit has been passed on to the consumer is not a sufficient basis for setting aside the obligation to repay the aid; the same submission may, on the other hand, meet with a favourable response in the case of unlawful Community aid.

58. It follows, therefore, that the Community interest requiring State aid to be recovered is clearly greater than the interest in the repayment of Community aid - indeed it appears to be difficult to set the former aside in favour of the protection of legitimate expectations. It may be observed in summary that, even where the refund of State aid is at issue, the Court follows, in principle, the reasoning adopted in Deutsche Milchkontor, namely: (i) the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations constitutes a general principle of Community law which is derived from the legal traditions common to the Member States; (ii) the scope of legitimate expectations and the conditions under which they apply are determined by the domestic law of the Member States; and (iii) the body applying the principle at national level must observe the principles of equal treatment and of effectiveness of Community law and respect the Community interest. However, precisely because of the particular nature of State aid and the need to safeguard the imperative Community interest in rectifying the conditions of competition, the Court has the tendency to restrict the legal autonomy of the national legal orders, by laying down itself the substantive requirements for recognising that legitimate expectations are entertained or even by directly prohibiting the application of national provisions.

59. More specifically, the Court has preferred to define the concept of a diligent businessman itself, restricting the opportunities for recipients of aid to invoke legitimate expectations. In addition, it has completely taken away the ability of the Member States to resort to the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations in order to avoid recovering unlawful aid. It has indeed gone as far as to reshape, if not overturn, national law on legitimate expectations with regard to the specific instances where it is applied in the context of the recovery of unlawful State aid. It is, I believe, essential to dwell on that last issue.

60. A characteristic example of the tendency to reduce the autonomy of the Member States is provided by the judgment in Land Rheinland-Pfalz v Alcan Deutschland (cited in footnote 28 above; hereinafter Alcan II), where the Court overrode Paragraph 48 of the German Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz (Law on Administrative Procedure). More specifically, it ruled:

Community law requires the competent authority to revoke a decision granting unlawful aid, in accordance with a final decision of the Commission declaring the aid incompatible with the common market and ordering recovery, [(i)] even if the authority has allowed the time-limit laid down for that purpose under national law in the interest of legal certainty to elapse..., [(ii)] even if the competent authority is responsible for the illegality of the aid decision to such a degree that revocation appears to be a breach of good faith towards the recipient, where the latter could not have had a legitimate expectation that the aid was lawful because the procedure laid down in Article 93 of the Treaty had not been followed... [and (iii)] even where such recovery is excluded by national law because the gain no longer exists, in the absence of bad faith on the part of the recipient of the aid.

61. It is to be noted that in that case the Court followed the Opinion of the Advocate General and found that the national authorities do not... have any discretion as regards revocation of a decision granting aid, overturning in that way the fundamental rule of German administrative law that it is in principle for the administration, acting in its discretion, to decide on the revocation of an advantageous administrative measure which is contrary to the law.

62. There is a further interesting aspect of the Community case-law on the repayment of unlawful State aid, from which it appears that the Court of Justice prefers to entrust the national courts with the issue of assessing the legitimate expectations of recipients of aid, the latter being expected to take action before those courts if they are to avoid returning the benefit which they have reaped.

63. It is not by accident that the possibility of relying on legitimate expectations is tied to the jurisdiction of the national courts. The latter are the national authorities before which legal disputes concerned with the enforcement of Commission decisions requiring unlawfully paid aid to be refunded are considered likely to end up. Furthermore, they provide greater guarantees of independence and neutrality than the national administrative departments which might also have played a part in the grant of the unlawful aid; it is therefore to be anticipated that national courts will weigh up the Community interest better than some other State authority. They are also the most suited to taking account of the parameter of the effectiveness of Community law. Finally, if a problem of interpretation arises with regard to the above issues and the way in which they affect the application of national rules concerning legitimate expectations, the national courts are in the privileged position of being able to refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

64. The national administrative authorities are of course allowed to reject submissions as to legitimate expectations, whereupon the recipient of the aid will in all probability bring proceedings in the national courts. By contrast, it is not open to those authorities not to seek recovery of the unlawful aid by accepting (whether acting of their own accord or following the submission of a request) that legitimate expectations are entertained. In that case they would be acting contrary to the direction of the Court of Justice as set out in Case C-5/89, cited in footnote 27 above. Moreover, that decision by the authorities would probably never be brought before the national courts for review, resulting in a risk that the Community interest would remain unprotected.

65. Consequently, always assuming that the above indications in the case-law are borne out by future judgments, it appears that the Court has laid down a further procedural and formal rule concerning the application of the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations where the recovery of unlawful State aid is at issue. Under the above rule, that general principle is not protected by the national administrative bodies, acting of their own accord or following a request, but by the courts. In other words, the national courts are converted into special authorities for assessing an issue which in principle falls within the competence of the administrative authorities, while the latter are relegated to bodies which merely implement Commission decisions.

66. In short, certain fundamental rules of national administrative law relating to the application of the principle of legality and to the division of powers between judicial and administrative authorities are undermined, if not entirely set aside, by the above case-law. Not only is the autonomy of national law shrunk to almost nothing when it is applied to cases with Community interest; more significantly, rather, through the safeguarding of the Community interest the constituent elements of the national legal order are prejudiced, possibly resulting in inexpert or even arbitrary legal structures.

67. The chief reason for the creation of the above - in my view regrettable - situation must be sought in the starting point from which the logic of the present case-law proceeds, that is to say in the acceptance of the duality of legitimate expectations. It is not clear that the endeavour to combine Community and national elements in order to fashion a dual-based concept of legitimate expectations results in conclusions which are acceptable for the legal system or in a satisfactory reconciliation of the need to protect the trader acting in good faith and the need to safeguard the conditions of competition.

68. Nor is it obvious that, by entrusting this issue to the national courts for decision by them, their role is enhanced, preserving the balance between the national and Community legal orders at the present stage of European integration. The national courts are in a difficult position. First, they do not feel secure when they rely on the specific provisions of national law, in particular following the stringent position adopted by the Court in Alcan II. Second, the Court of Justice, by its abovementioned case-law, is giving them strong encouragement to refer questions to it for a preliminary ruling on a systematic basis, especially when they are called on to weigh up the Community interest in that particular category of disputes. From the moment, however, that definition of the Community interest determines entirely whether, and in what manner, the national provisions will be applied, the whole legal problem passes in reality to the high inspectorate of the Court. Finally, it is not clear that legal certainty is served by the fact that the national rules regarding legitimate expectations remain in force but may be overturned at any moment if they are considered to be incompatible with the objectives of Community law.

69. Following the above general observations, I will now consider the ground of appeal before the Court in the light of its case-law referred to above. On the basis of that case-law, I consider that the Court of First Instance was correct in finding that it was not open to the French Government to submit that the racecourse undertakings entertained legitimate expectations as a result of the abovementioned judgment of the Conseil d'Etat as regards the lawfulness of the national measure at issue and, consequently, that the Commission should not have relied on that submission to restrict the temporal scope of the obligation to recover the unlawfully granted aid.

70. The principal argument in favour of the position adopted by the Court of First Instance must, prima facie, be sought in the settled case-law of the Court, according to which a Member State whose authorities have granted aid contrary to the procedural rules laid down in Article 93 may not rely on the legitimate expectations of recipients in order to justify a failure to comply with the obligation to take the steps necessary to implement a Commission decision instructing it to recover the aid. If it could do so, Articles 92 and 93 of the Treaty would be set at naught, since national authorities would thus be able to rely on their own unlawful conduct in order to deprive decisions taken by the Commission under provisions of the Treaty of their effectiveness. Moreover, the Court of First Instance expressly refers to that case-law in paragraph 181 of the contested judgment.

71. That prohibition laid down by the Court of Justice appears to be founded, first of all, on the general principle under which nobody may obtain benefit from his own violation of the law (nemo potens propriam turpitudinem allegans). In other words, it has been adjudged unacceptable for the effectiveness of the Community rule - which is safeguarded by the imposition of a strict obligation to notify proposed aid and by the systematic repayment of aid which has been given unlawfully - to be undermined by the very transgressor, namely the Member State, relying on conduct contrary to the Community interest. To allow such reliance could give rise to the absurd result that a Member State is vindicated where, apart from infringing the express obligation to inform the Commission laid down by Article 93(3) of the EC Treaty, it has succeeded in shaping the legal and factual context within which a sum of aid is granted in such a way as to mislead even the diligent businessman, thereby rendering practically inapplicable the decision declaring the aid contrary to Community competition law.

72. In addition, a second argument can be advanced in favour of preventing the Member States from resorting to the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations in order to avoid the recovery of unlawful aid; the concept of legitimate expectations is subjective in nature and must therefore be assessed in concreto, taking account not only of the conduct of the public (Community and national) authorities which is the underlying reason for the expectations but also of the features particular to the person who entertains them. Thus, when the question is raised as to whether the recipient of the aid entertained legitimate expectations that the aid was lawful (in which case it might not have to be recovered) it is preferable for the authority which will decide that question to have a direct connection with the trader allegedly persuaded that the conduct at national level was lawful; it is then possible to carry out the fullest assessment of those aspects of the concept of legitimate expectations which relate to the subjective situation and to the conduct of the person holding the expectations, for example the diligence which he displayed and/or his good faith. This point also appears to be implicit in the Court's preference in favour of entrusting the issue to the national courts and in principle not examining it within the framework of disputes between Member States and the Community, when the recipient of the aid is not present.

73. As Advocate General Tesauro observes in his Opinion in Spain v Commission, when the Member State which is the applicant in the case refers to the expectations of the undertaking in receipt of the aid, in actual fact it is contesting the obligation imposed on it by the decision to recover the aids at issue, by invoking a legal situation which is not its own, but that of another, the beneficiary undertaking, which is not a party to [those] proceedings, even as an intervener; it is doing that at best in the absence of any specific provision of law conferring on it any such rights of subrogation.

74. The weight of the above arguments is undermined, however, by the solution reached by the Court in the same case. In its judgment, the Court did not adopt the absolute position proposed by the Advocate General but examined the merits of the submission which had been advanced by Spain relating to the expectations of the recipient undertaking. The Court did not rule fully on the question as to whether or not the undertaking which had benefited from the aid entertained legitimate expectations when it received it, but restricted itself to one aspect of the issue, stating that the fact that the Commission initially decided not to raise any objections to the aid in issue cannot be regarded as capable of having caused the recipient undertaking to entertain any legitimate expectation since that decision was challenged in due time before the Court....

75. Even after that explanation, however, it is clear that this development in the case-law calls into question, if not conclusions, at least the reasoning of the case-law cited above. From the moment that the Court considered the merits of the submission put forward by Spain, that is to say by a State which had not notified proposed aid, it set aside the argument that national authorities are unable to invoke legitimate expectations in order that they do not benefit from their own unlawful conduct. Similarly, the argument that, when the person entertaining the legitimate expectations is absent from the Community proceedings, the legal issue relating thereto cannot be fully dealt with loses much of its value; in Spain v Commission the undertakings which had received the aid did not appear before the Court.

76. In my view, the judgment in Spain v Commission reveals the basic criterion for deciding whether or not the issue of legitimate expectations must be considered by the Court when it is put forward by a Member State. The criterion is none other than the duality of legitimate expectations which is acknowledged by the case-law in the context of the repayment of unlawful State aid. When the underlying reason for the creation of expectations that the national measure is lawful is attributed to the conduct of national authorities, the Court refuses to intervene; only as an exception does it agree to rule on whether legitimate expectations formed at national level should be protected or are contrary to the Community interest. By contrast, in cases where it is contended that the mistaken belief as to the legality of the State measure was created by conduct of the Community authorities, usually the Commission, the Court appears to cast its qualms aside and examines that particular dimension of the issue of legitimate expectations.

77. Spain v Commission was such an instance. In its judgment in that case, the Court exceptionally agreed to examine whether particular conduct on the part of the Commission - its adoption of a decision stating that it wished to raise no objections to the grant of the aid at issue - could be regarded as the underlying reason for a legitimate belief on the part of the recipient of the aid that the latter was consistent with Community law. The choice made by the Court to go into the substance of the issue was directly connected with the Community nature of the conduct at issue, that is to say with the fact that the conduct was attributable to a Community institution.

78. Transposing the above reasoning to the present case, I note that there is no mention in Decision 93/625 of the extent to which the Commission itself or another Community institution had, by its conduct, caused the PMU to believe that there were no problems as regards the compatibility of the State aid with Community law; nevertheless, the Commission agrees to examine whether a national judicial decision created, on the basis of national legal rules, expectations on the part of the recipients of the aid which deserved protection. In that way, the Commission involves itself with the assessment of conduct to be attributed to a national authority, an assessment which is carried out in accordance with the national provisions governing the protection of legitimate expectations and the revocation of unlawful administrative measures. In accordance with the case-law as analysed above, the option taken by the Commission of examining the issue in question is therefore not justified. It constitutes an intervention into the purely national dimension of a legal problem which not only exceeds its institutional competence but also offends against the duality of prior expectations in the particular context of the repayment of State aid contrary to Article 92 et seq. of the EC Treaty.

79. In view of the above reasoning, no error of law is apparent in the position of the Court of First Instance that the Commission was wrong to restrict in time the recovery of the unlawful State aid in question on the basis of the French Government's submissions as to legitimate expectations entertained by the PMU.

(ii) Legitimate expectations as a purely Community concept

80. The starting point for the following analysis is a different definition of legitimate expectations, for instances where that concept arises in the particular context of the recovery of unlawful State aid. This definition deviates from the Deutsche Milchkontor case-law inasmuch as it gives the concept of legitimate expectations a purely Community content, that is to say its application is not, under this definition, a matter for the rules of national law. The definition is founded on the idea that, in the legal context at issue, the protection of legitimate expectations is a concern of the Community legal order, being a parameter connected with the exercise of an exclusively Community competence; that competence consists in remedying the severe damage caused to the conditions of competition in inter-State trade by the payment of unlawful State aid. The administrative measure which gives rise to an issue of protection of legitimate expectations is the Commission decision requiring the aid granted contrary to the Community interests to be recovered. The national measures giving effect to that decision are in reality implementing measures which the national administration is under a mandatory duty to take.

81. The transfer of such a matter to the exclusive regulatory power of Community law is, of course, a further blow to the autonomy of national law, inasmuch as it takes away a particular area of jurisdiction. However, that need not appear strange from a legal point of view or be considered to constitute an impermissible intervention by the Community legal order in the national legal orders which is contrary to the current status quo and not justified at the present stage of European integration.

82. The need to safeguard the effectiveness of Community law when it is implemented at national level has led not only, from the negative point of view, to the shrinking of national legal autonomy - a characteristic example being Alcan II - but also, positively, to the restriction of the scope of national law by express formulation of the rules to be applied. Examples are Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EC which contain the procedural rules for ensuring that Community law on public works is duly observed.

83. It is also important to refer to a less well-known passage from the judgment in Deutsche Milchkontor, where it is held that the need of Community law to intervene in relation to the rules governing the repayment of unlawful aid, that is to say an area of law still open to the Member States, cannot be ruled out. More specifically, while the Court stated that in the absence of provisions of Community law disputes concerning the recovery of amounts unduly paid under Community law must be decided by national courts pursuant to their own national law subject to the limits imposed by Community law, it then observed that if disparities in the legislation of Member States proved to be such as to compromise... equal treatment... or distort or impair the functioning of the common market, it would be for the competent Community institutions to adopt the provisions needed to remedy such disparities. It is therefore expressly foreseen that Community measures might be adopted on issues relating to the repayment of unlawful aid and the safeguarding of the conditions of competition even though they currently fall within national competence. Such measures would consist in the harmonisation of national provisions or assimilation of the way in which a particular legal issue is dealt with by the national authorities.

84. That pronouncement by the Court is entirely correct and reinforces the comments made above regarding the Community character of the issue of repayment of aid. In particular, the fact that national rules governing the recovery of unlawful aid, which include the parameter of the protection of legitimate expectations, are applied does not mean that that issue is brought within the scope of the national legal order; their application is justified, however, by the fact that, as Community law currently stands, detailed Community provisions have not yet been enacted. The Community institutions therefore retain the power of regulatory intervention if they judge that the Community interest is not met by application of the national rules.

85. The very same reasoning provides the context for the proposition under consideration, whereby legitimate expectations become a Community concept; however, the need for Community law to intervene with regard to the meaning and practical application of the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations as entertained by recipients of State aid is not justified solely in order to protect the Community interest more fully but also in order to avoid the adverse effects on national administrative law which result from the prevailing case-law, as set out above.

86. The intervention by Community law could be achieved by drafting Community legislation which would include the basic procedural and substantive rules governing the recovery of unlawful aid and, of course, also broach the issue of safeguards for traders who have in good faith received such State assistance. Furthermore, I am of the view that the absence, until now at least, of Community legislation governing the repayment of aid may be made good, in particular so far as concerns the protection of legitimate expectations, by the work of the Court in shaping the law. It is feasible for the Community judicature to engage in a venture of that kind for two reasons. First, in accordance with the theoretical traditions common to national administrative law, the protection of legitimate expectations constitutes a general principle of law and there is thus scope for filling the gaps in the legislation by means of case-law. Second, the concept at issue already exists as a general principle with a purely Community content, applying principally to the revocation of unlawful administrative measures which create rights.

87. I can therefore see no practical obstacle to accepting that the question of the protection of a trader acting in good faith who has benefited from a national measure contrary to Articles 92 and 93 of the EC Treaty be judged on the basis of the Community principle of legitimate expectations, as applied in the particular context of the recovery of unlawful State aid. In other words, the body applying Community law - and ultimately the Court - will seek to ascertain whether certainty was created in the trader's mind that the aid was compatible with Community law, before balancing the private interest in not repaying the aid against the Community interest.

88. Two observations are called for at this point. First, the national provisions which operate to protect legitimate expectations under domestic law are not immaterial when assessing whether recipients of aid have expectations which are protected at Community level. It is logical for the particular circumstances under which that issue is judged in national law to influence a trader acting in good faith, and they may be sufficient to persuade him that the State aid from which he has benefited is not only lawful but also irreversible. In that case, it is necessary to determine - of course from the standpoint of Community law - the extent to which the national provisions contribute to the creation of legitimate expectations under Community law. Both the conduct of the national authorities which is presented as the underlying reason for the belief that the aid is lawful and the particular provisions concerning legitimate expectations are substantive issues for Community law and as such are taken into account by the body implementing it.

89. Second, when the private interest of a trader acting in good faith is balanced against the general Community interest in rectifying the conditions of competition and ensuring that the Community rules are observed, it is expected that the outcome will be unfavourable to the trader. Moreover, we are not faced with a classic relationship between a benefits authority and an individual, as is usually the case in national law. In the category of disputes under consideration, the unlawful act of the national authorities does not prove detrimental solely to their own interests, when it could be maintained that they themselves are to blame for the financial loss which they will suffer if aid is not repaid; that unlawful act adversely affects both a superior legal order, that of the Community, and a category of persons, namely competitors and all those who suffer the adverse consequences of the distortion of competition and the prejudice to inter-State trade. I therefore believe that, in practice, the cases where the protection of the legitimate expectations of a recipient of aid prevails over the abovementioned interests will prove to be entirely exceptional. In order for there to be such an exception, the particular position in which the trader acting in good faith has been placed must be deserving of special protection, a situation which in principle arises only when he is misled into believing that the aid is lawful not only by the conduct or measures of the national authorities but also by inappropriate or misleading acts on the part of the Community institutions. Only then is the need to safeguard the Community interest weakened and the need to protect the trader acting in good faith correspondingly strengthened.

90. Having regard to the foregoing, I will now examine the question which occupied the Court of First Instance in the present case. If the above analysis is accepted, the Commission was correct to consider the issue of the legitimate expectations entertained by the PMU, and the Court of

First Instance was wrong to find that it was not open to the Commission to assess the ground put forward by the French Government. That view is imposed precisely by the Community character of the protection of legitimate expectations entertained by recipients of aid acting in good faith. Since the investigation as to whether those expectations exist flows from the general principles of Community law, the Commission, when adopting the relevant measures regarding repayment of the unlawful aid, is not merely entitled, but obliged, to consider that parameter.

91. A number of objections contesting the above view may be put forward. First of all, acceptance that the Commission is able, or even required, to consider the issue in question in the course of the Community procedure at issue means that the Member States are indirectly given the opportunity to derive benefit from their own unlawful acts and that the legitimate expectations end up being assessed in the absence of the person alleged to hold them, without his even having made a request in that regard. I have already explained that the value of those arguments is only relative and that the Court puts them to one side when faced with a case where it is contended that a measure or conduct of a Community institution has given rise to the trader's belief that the aid is lawful. I consider that the same arguments lose force if it is accepted that the issue of legitimate expectations of a recipient of aid falls in the domain of Community law. In accordance with a commonly held view in administrative law, the protection of legitimate expectations, as a fundamental principle which governs the action of administrative bodies under every legal system, must be taken into account by those bodies of their own accord. Since the Commission must therefore examine that parameter in any event, it is entirely within the Commission's power to rely on it in its decisions even if they are adopted in the absence of the person immediately concerned - that is to say the person entertaining the expectations - or even without a request by him in that regard. It is immaterial that the Member States may benefit if the aid is not repaid. The decision that it need not be repaid will have been adopted irrespective of the appraisal of their interests, and that decision does not remove their liability arising from the unlawful acts which have been committed, a liability which may have various unfavourable legal consequences for them.

92. Nor would there be any foundation to the argument that acknowledgment of that competence to the Commission prejudices the national courts, which are the natural adjudicators of the legitimate expectations of recipients of State aid. Irrespective of the Commission's assessment, the national courts, as the ordinary courts of Community law, may examine the issue in question if an application is made to them. Indeed, if they consider that the Commission has misinterpreted and misapplied the Community principle of the protection of legitimate expectations, they can refer a question to the Court for a preliminary ruling.

93. I consider that greater attention should be paid to another criticism which may be made of the view which I am now putting forward, a criticism which relates to the limits of the Community legal order. Does the suggested transfer to Community law alone of jurisdiction to apply legitimate expectations constitute an excessive and impermissible challenge to the Community legal order? As I have explained above, the solution of making the protection of legitimate expectations a Community matter, even solely in relation to the particular issue of the repayment of unlawful State aid, is at first sight a significant blow to the autonomy of national law, in that it takes away a portion of national jurisdiction. Nevertheless, I take the view that that blow is preferable to the blow inflicted by the case-law of the Court of Justice to date, on the grounds that the Community interest is better protected, legal clarity and certainty are enhanced and the specific elements which make up the national legal order are safeguarded. As I have stated at a previous point in my analysis, it proves more prejudicial to national law, and is uncertain from a systemic and theoretical viewpoint, for national law to be legally autonomous in circumstances where fundamental rules of the national legal order might be overturned or even distorted when they are applied in cases of interest to the Community.

94. The answer to this ground of appeal remains to be given. Having regard to the above analysis, must the solution adopted by the Court of First Instance be set aside? I think not. Despite the mistaken reasoning adopted by it when assessing the relevant part of the Commission decision, the conclusion which it reached is correct, irrespective of its grounds. As is clear from the contested judgment, the Commission decided to restrict recovery of the unlawful aid, finding that a judgment of the French Conseil d'Etat gave rise to legitimate expectations on the part of the racecourse undertakings. However, it failed to explain the specific reasons why the protection of those expectations - assuming that they were in fact legitimate - prevailed over the mandatory Community interest in restoring free competition and inter-State trade following the very heavy damage caused by unlawful State aid, especially when, as stated above, the need to protect the interests of the person who has received the aid in good faith may prevail only in wholly exceptional cases over the need to safeguard the Community interest at issue. Accordingly, Commission Decision 93/625 manifestly suffered from a defective statement of grounds and was correctly annulled by the Court of First Instance.

(iii) Failure to notify State aid as a ground which precludes legitimate expectations

95. A final point requires explanation. The appellant criticises in particular paragraph 182 of the contested judgment, where it is, in its view, held that an undertaking in receipt of aid may rely on exceptional circumstances establishing that the aid is lawful only where the procedure under Article 93 of the Treaty has been observed. It is not in fact clear that such an absolute position, under which the formal requirements of Article 93 of the EC Treaty must always be satisfied in order for prior expectations to be recognised, is in line with the conclusions of the case-law to date.

96. It follows from a review of the case-law that the reasoning of the Court may be condensed into the following two propositions. On the one hand, the Court observes that, in view of the mandatory nature of the supervision of State aid by the Commission under Article 93 of the Treaty, undertakings to which an aid has been granted may not, in principle, entertain a legitimate expectation that the aid is lawful unless it has been granted in compliance with the procedure laid down in that article. A diligent businessman should normally be able to determine whether that procedure has been followed. On the other hand, the Court nevertheless finds that it is true that a recipient of illegally granted aid is not precluded from relying on exceptional circumstances on the basis of which it had legitimately assumed the aid to be lawful and thus declining to refund that aid. If such a case is brought before a national court, it is for that court to assess the material circumstances, if necessary after obtaining a preliminary ruling on interpretation from the Court of Justice. Thus, while in principle a failure to comply with the obligation of notification laid down by Article 93 of the Treaty prevents legitimate expectations from being created, a recipient of aid nevertheless has a narrow leeway for proving that there may be exceptional circumstances which enable the presumption against him that there are no legitimate expectations to be rebutted.

97. There is, of course, also the precedent of Alcan II, where the Court refers to the general position set out above, but appears in the end to consider that legitimate expectations were not entertained in the case before it solely because the State aid at issue had not been notified. However, I do not consider that that judgment is sufficient to overturn the previous case-law and to establish an irrebuttable presumption that failure to notify national measures is sufficient to preclude the creation of legitimation expectations on the part of the recipient of the aid.

98. In any event, however, the error detected in paragraph 182 of the contested judgment is not sufficient to undermine its correctness, since the position of the Court of First Instance with regard to the relevant point of the disputed Commission decision is entirely correct for the reasons previously set out.

IV - Conclusion

99. In view of the foregoing, I propose that the Court should:

- dismiss the appeal in its entirety;

- order the appellant to pay the costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Mischo delivered on 10 June 1999.
Alcatel Austria AG and Others, Siemens AG Osterreich and Sag-Schrack Anlagentechnik AG v Bundesministerium für Wissenschaft und Verkehr.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public procurement - Procedure for the award of public supply and works contracts - Review procedure.
Case C-81/98.

1 In proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office) concerning the award of a public supply and works contract, certain questions have been raised, in the view of that court, as to the interpretation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (1) (hereinafter `the review directive').

2 In May 1996 the Austrian Federal Ministry of Science and Transport, the contracting authority, published an invitation to tender for the installation on the Austrian motorway network of an electronic system for the automatic transmission of certain data.

3 On 5 September 1996 the contract was awarded to the chosen tenderer and signed on the same day. According to the national court, the other tenderers learned of the contract through the press.

4 On 18 September 1996 the Bundesvergabeamt dismissed applications for interim measures to suspend performance of the concluded contract; then, in its decision in the main proceedings on 4 April 1997, it held that there had been various breaches of the Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law).

5 The decision of the Bundesvergabeamt of 18 September 1996 was set aside by the Verfassungsgerichtshof (Constitutional Court), as a result of which the Bundesvergabeamt quashed its decision of 4 April 1997 and made an interim order prohibiting further performance of the contract. That interim order was made provisionally inoperative by a decision of the Verfassungsgerichtshof of 10 October 1997.

6 By order of 3 March 1998 the Bundesvergabeamt referred certain questions concerning the review directive to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

7 Article 1 of Directive 89/665 provides:

`1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC and 77/62/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement...'

8 Article 2(1) of the review directive provides as follows:

`The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.'

9 Article 2(6) of the review directive states:

`The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.'

10 The national provisions applicable to the main proceedings are contained in the Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law, BGBl. No 462/1993) in the version prior to the 1997 amendments (hereinafter `the BVergG').

11 Paragraph 9, point 14, of the BVergG defines `award' as follows:

`The award of the contract is the declaration made to the tenderer accepting his offer.'

12 Paragraph 41(1) of the BVergG states:

`The contractual relationship between the contracting authority and the tenderer comes into being, within the period allowed for making the award, when the tenderer receives notification of the acceptance of his offer. If the period allowed for making the award has expired or the terms of the contract differ from those of the offer, the contractual relationship comes into being only when the tenderer gives written notification of its acceptance of the contract. The tenderer is to be allowed a reasonable period of time to give this notification.'

13 Paragraph 91 of the BVergG sets out the jurisdiction of the national court which has made the reference, the Bundesvergabeamt, as follows :

`1. The Bundesvergabeamt has jurisdiction to determine applications for review in accordance with the provisions of this chapter.

2. The Bundesvergabeamt has jurisdiction up until the award of the contract, upon application

1. to make orders for interim measures, and

2. to set aside unlawful decisions of the awarding department of the contracting authority in order to eliminate infringements of the present law or regulations made thereunder.

3. Once the contract has been awarded the Bundesvergabeamt has jurisdiction to determine whether, as a result of an infringement of this law or of regulations made thereunder, the contract was not awarded to the tenderer making the best offer. In such a procedure the Bundesvergabeamt also has jurisdiction, even where there has been no infringement of this law or regulations thereunder, to determine, on application by the contracting authority, whether the contract ought not to have been awarded to a particular tenderer or candidate who has been passed over.'

14 Finally, Paragraph 94 of the BVergG provides, inter alia, as follows:

`1. The Bundesvergabeamt must set aside by way of a decision, taking into account the opinion of the Conciliation Committee in the case, any decision of the contracting authority in an award procedure which

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

1. is contrary to the provisions of this Federal Law or its implementing regulations and

2. significantly affects the outcome of the award procedure....

3. Once the contract has been awarded the Bundesvergabeamt may rule only on the question whether, in the circumstances set out in paragraph 1, the alleged infringement has occurred or not.'

15 By order dated 3 March 1998, the Bundesvergabeamt (Fourth Chamber) referred for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EC Treaty (now Article 234 EC) the following questions:

`(1) When implementing Directive 89/665/EEC are Member States required by Article 2(6) thereof to ensure that the contracting authority's decision prior to the conclusion of the contract as to the bidder in a tender procedure with which, in the light of the procedure's results, it will conclude the contract (i.e. the award decision) is, in any event, open to a procedure whereby an applicant may have that decision annulled if the relevant conditions are met, notwithstanding the possibility once the contract has been concluded of restricting the legal effects of the review procedure to an award of damages?

(2) If Question 1 is answered in the affirmative:

Is the obligation described in Question 1 sufficiently clear and precise to confer on individuals the right to a review corresponding to the requirements of Article 1 of Directive 89/665/EEC, in which the national court must in any event be able to adopt interim measures within the meaning of Article 2(1)(a) and (b) of that directive and to annul the contracting authority's award decision, and the right to rely in proceedings on that obligation as against the Member State?

(3) If Question 2 is answered in the affirmative:

Is the obligation described under Question 1 also sufficiently clear and precise to mean that in such a procedure the national court must disregard contrary provisions of national law which would prevent the court from fulfilling that obligation, and must fulfil that obligation directly as part of Community law even if national law lacks any basis on which to act?'

Preliminary remark

16 The Austrian Ministry of Science and Transport, which is the respondent in the main proceedings, contends, in common with the Austrian Government, that in fact the dispute in the main proceedings is now closed and the contract has already been performed in its entirety. That being the case, the answer to the questions raised will be irrelevant in the context of this dispute since the applicants can now obtain only damages, the award of which is, in any case, provided for under national law.

17 The Commission also has doubts as to the admissibility of the questions referred to the Court. These are based on the fact that, whilst citing Article 2(6) of the review directive, the questions are in reality seeking an interpretation of Article 2(1) of that directive which is concerned with the period prior to the conclusion of the award contract. In the present case that contract has already been concluded.

18 The national court states, first, that it is the court of last resort in the matter by reason of national procedural rules, application to the Verfassungsgerichtshof being an extraordinary legal remedy which is not in the nature of an appeal. In those circumstances the Bundesvergabeamt considers itself obliged, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 177 of the EC Treaty, to refer to the Court of Justice questions of Community law arising in these proceedings.

19 It must nevertheless be noted that the fact that the national court is a court of last resort does not exclude the possibility that the questions referred are hypothetical in nature.

20 The national court adds, however, that under national law it remains relevant to establish if it was entitled, or even required, as a matter of Community law, to set aside its decision of 4 April 1997, by which, in determining that the awards procedure did not result in the contract being awarded to the tenderer who had made the best offer, it brought an end to the first set of proceedings. The questions referred will affect the outcome of that issue in the main proceedings, which will in any event have to be resolved, regardless of the awards procedure which underlies it, even if the awards procedure in question is completely settled in the meantime.

21 The national court further emphasises that at this stage it is not yet possible to determine whether this is the case. Account must be taken of the fact that the warranty period for the performance of the contract in question has not yet expired and it therefore theoretically remains open to the awarding authority to rescind the contract which cannot yet therefore be considered definitively executed.

22 The Commission also takes the view that the questions referred to the Court may be of importance for the subsequent development of the dispute in the main proceedings.

23 The Commission notes first that criminal proceedings are pending to ascertain whether any offence was committed when the contract was awarded. If that was the case then the contracting authority would be entitled to rescind the contract and, the Commission considers, depending on the interpretation to be given in this case to the requirements of Community law, there might even be an obligation to rescind the contract.

24 The Commission further emphasises that the answers to the questions raised may affect the level of any damages payable to the applicants.

25 Lastly the Commission states that the Court's answer to the first question could result in the contract or award decision being void, which would then render it necessary to deal with the second and third questions.

26 In my opinion the considerations raised by the Commission are such as to justify the conclusion that the answers to the questions raised may affect the subsequent course of the main proceedings. The reference by the national court should not, therefore, be regarded as inadmissible on the ground that the questions raised are hypothetical.

Question 1

27 The Bundesvergabeamt asks essentially whether the Member States are required by the review directive to ensure that the decision to award a public contract is in all cases subject to a review procedure whereby an unsuccessful tenderer can have that decision set aside.

28 Article 2(1) of the review directive sets out the review procedures which the Member States are obliged to put in place. They must provide for the powers to adopt `interim measures' by way of `interlocutory procedures' with the aim of eliminating the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned (point (a)), the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully (point (b)), and the award of damages (point (c)).

29 The provision does not define exhaustively what is meant by `decisions taken unlawfully' which may be required to be set aside, instead referring by way of example to discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents, or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure in question.

30 This category must, however, include an unlawful decision awarding the contract. The purpose of the review directive as it appears, in particular, from Article 1(1) and the third and fourth recitals in the preamble, is the establishment of the most effective review procedures possible so as to ensure compliance with the Community directives concerning public procurement, the object of which is to open the latter up to Community competition.

31 This purpose would be compromised if paradoxically the most important decision in the procedure, namely the award of the contract itself, could not be treated as one of the unlawful decisions capable of being set aside, as the applicants in the main proceedings rightly point out.

32 The Court (2) has already stated the importance of this objective of effectiveness in the context of the directive, emphasising that the directive's purpose is that of `reinforcing existing arrangements at both national and Community levels for ensuring effective application of Community directives on the award of public contracts, in particular at the stage where infringements can still be rectified.'

33 The Ministry of Science and Transport contends, however, that Article 2(6) of the review directive allows a Member State to provide that, once the contract following the award decision has been concluded, the powers of the national court responsible for review procedures are confined to awarding damages to any person affected by a breach of the rules.

34 In the present case the Austrian legislature merely took advantage of that possibility and therefore complied with the review directive, even if the situation could arise where, because notification of the award decision and the conclusion of the contract might take place at the same time, it would be impossible to have the decision awarding the contract set aside.

35 Such an interpretation takes no account of the chronological sequence in which the review procedures provided for by Article 2(1) and (6) are to apply.

36 The limitation on remedies provided for by Article 2(6) relates to the contract following the award decision. That provision therefore implies that, in the eyes of the Community legislature, the conclusion of the contract and the decision awarding the contract cannot coincide in time.

37 As the Commission submits, the review directive thus clearly envisages two distinct phases in the review procedure: before the conclusion of the contract Article 2(1) applies and requires Member States to ensure complete judicial protection; after the contract is concluded, the limitation provided for in Article 2(6) applies and the sole remedy available is an award of damages.

38 The extent of the contrast between those two phases should not be underestimated. The setting aside of a decision means that tenderers seeking review retain their chances of winning the contract. Conversely, damages alone are often unsatisfactory compensation for a company passed over, having regard to the difficulties it might face, in particular, in quantifying its loss and proving a causal link with the infringement of Community law. It would in any event be easy for the contracting authority to minimise the chances of success of the complainant. Moreover, a potential complainant is likely to be reticent about instituting proceedings for fear of compromising its future relations with the contracting authority, when in any event the contracting authority is unlikely to put it back into a position where it could win the contract. (3)

39 The effectiveness of the review directive, and in particular its objective, set out in Article 1(1), of establishing rapid and effective review procedures, would be compromised if it were open to a Member State to widen the limitation provided for in Article 2(6) to such an extent that the most important decision of the contracting authority, namely the award of the contract, would systematically be covered by the limitation, and would thus be removed from the full protection established by Article 2(1).

40 The objective of reinforcing remedies which is laid down by the review directive requires that the possibility left open to the Member States to limit them should be regarded as an exception and so be interpreted restrictively.

41 The purpose of such a limitation is to ensure legal certainty in protecting the contract, thus recognising the contract's specific status in the award procedure in theoretically bringing it to an end.

42 By contrast there is no justification for inferring from this the possibility of restricting the review procedures applicable to those administrative decisions which precede the conclusion of the contract.

43 National legislation cannot therefore invoke Article 2(6) for the purpose of excluding a procedure for having the decision awarding the contract set aside.

44 It should, moreover, be emphasised that that solution is perfectly compatible with the view that the review directive does not undermine the private law systems in the Member States because it is the national legal system alone which determines the effects of the remedies envisaged by the directive in respect of the contract which follows the award decision.

45 I would add lastly that there would be a number of paradoxical consequences were it accepted that national legislation could define the time of conclusion of the contract, at which point the legal protection of the unsuccessful tenderers becomes limited, in such a way that the decision awarding the contract was also affected by that limitation.

46 As I have already stated, that would mean that the most important decision could not be set aside whilst other, lesser ones could be, simply because they were reached earlier.

47 Furthermore, irregularities in the decision awarding the contract would then be highly unlikely to have any consequences for the award of the contract. The only means of challenging the award decision would be by seeking to set aside the contract, although the problem does not intrinsically arise from the contract but from the failure to observe the necessary conditions for the legality of an administrative act, which is not the same as the contract. Procedural effectiveness and economy therefore require that there should be a separate procedure for reviewing, in sufficient time, the validity of the decision awarding the contract.

48 I turn now to consider the application of those principles to the present case.

49 As the national court has explained, as a matter of Austrian law the contract is considered to be concluded when the decision awarding the contract is notified to the successful tenderer. That notification is treated in civil law as the acceptance of the tenderer's offer.

50 The sole exception to that situation is if the period allowed for making the award has expired or the terms of the contract differ from those of the offer. In that case, the contractual relationship only comes into being when the tenderer gives written notification of his acceptance of the contract.

51 According to the Bundesvergabeamt, whilst it is strictly true that the decision awarding the contract precedes the conclusion of the contract, it takes place within the internal organisation of the contracting authority and is not communicated to the interested parties before being notified to the chosen tenderer. That notification, as well as being the first external manifestation of the decision, seals the contract and thus renders the decision immune from proceedings to set it aside.

52 The national court considers that it follows from this that the award decision as such, by which the contracting authority chooses the tenderer with which it will contract, is not open to challenge. The unsuccessful tenderers are, furthermore, not generally aware of the decision, nor can they become so.

53 It must therefore be concluded that the effect of the relevant national legislation is, as a general rule, to exclude the possibility of a review procedure to set aside the decision awarding the contract.

54 It follows from the foregoing that such a situation does not comply with the requirements of the review directive.

55 The respondent in the main proceedings, meanwhile, disputes the national court's presentation of the relevant national law.

56 That is, however, a matter for the national court, whose task is to apply the principles handed down by the Court to the present case. The respondent cannot substitute its own analysis of the relevant national law for that of the national court.

57 The Ministry of Science and Transport specifically denies that the unsuccessful tenderers are unable to learn of the decision awarding the contract before the conclusion of the contract. It claims that those tenderers can avail themselves of the legislation relating to access to administrative documents and request the administration to inform them of its decision.

58 It must be pointed out, however, that such a possibility cannot be regarded as adequate compensation for the lack of any obligation on the part of the administration to inform the unsuccessful tenderers of the decision awarding the contract before the conclusion of the contract, thereby giving them a genuine opportunity to commence review proceedings.

59 This is a fortiori the case in respect of tendering procedures where, as noted by the review directive, award procedures are of particularly short duration whereas, as was stated at the oral hearing, the national legislation on access to administrative documents grants the administration a period of two months within which to reply to requests.

60 The Austrian Government argues that, if the review directive was to be interpreted as requiring a separation between the decision awarding the contract and the conclusion of the contract, then nowhere does the directive define the necessary delay between the two. This period could be reduced to one second of `thinking time'.

61 It is appropriate however in this case to take into account what is required for the effectiveness of the review directive. This means, as we have seen, that a procedure for having the decision awarding the contract set aside must be possible. It necessarily follows that, having regard to the short duration of procedures for the award of public contracts, a reasonable time must elapse between the time when the decision awarding the contract is notified to the unsuccessful tenderers, so that they may challenge the decision, and the conclusion of the contract, after which time Article 2(6) applies.

62 The United Kingdom Government submits that since there are different types of award procedures it is not possible to fix a single period of time. Therefore it should be for the legislature to take the initiative in the matter.

63 In my view, however, the fact that the review directive does not mention any specific period of time does not prevent the Court from construing it in a way that complies with the requirements of effectiveness. Since, as we have seen, effectiveness will be maintained only if the award decision is open to challenge, it therefore follows that there must be a reasonable time-limit for any challenge. That limit is, of course, likely to vary according to the circumstances of the case, and in particular, according to the type of award procedure in question.

64 The Austrian Government, supported by the German Government, points out that the review directive is a coordinating rather than a harmonising directive. Accordingly, it must be assumed that the Council did not intend to constrain those Member States such as the Republic of Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany and, to a certain extent, the United Kingdom, in which it is possible for notification of the decision awarding the contract to coincide in time with the conclusion of the contract, to change their public procurement procedures.

65 The fact remains, however, that that argument is not supported by the travaux préparatoires of the review directive.

66 On the contrary, in its presentation of the reasoning behind the draft amended directive, the Commission expressly lists, amongst the shortcomings in the national systems concerning review procedures, the fact that it is not possible in all the Member States to have the award decision set aside by administrative or judicial means. (4)

67 It is therefore clear that in the view of the Commission, at least, the review directive is intended to put in place such a possibility.

68 In any event, it is the actual wording of the review directive, as enacted by the legislature, which is determinant. Even if the wording is not of sufficient clarity for it to require no effort in interpretation, it is nevertheless the case, as we have just seen, that it is not so obscure as to require reference to external factors in order to determine the intention expressed by the legislature.

69 The Government of the United Kingdom further claims that the interpretation of the review directive put forward by the Commission and the applicants directly contradicts the system established by the Community legislature in Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts. (5) As evidenced in particular by Articles 7, 9 and 10, that directive is detailed and exhaustive. It does not provide for any time to elapse between the decision awarding the contract and its conclusion.

70 It must be noted, however, that, corresponding to the provisions cited by the United Kingdom, are equivalent provisions in earlier directives, in particular Directives 89/440/EEC (6) and 88/295/EEC. (7)

71 It appears clearly from the review directive that it is intended to supplement the system established by the abovementioned two directives. Thus the first recital in the preamble to the review directive notes that the earlier directives `do not contain any specific provisions ensuring their effective application.'

72 The inevitable conclusion therefore is that Directive 93/96, cited above, is not so exhaustive in nature that the review directive can add nothing to its provisions.

73 Thus Article 7(1) of Directive 93/36 is cited by the United Kingdom because it provides only as follows: `The contracting authority shall within 15 days of the date on which the request is received, inform any eliminated candidate or tenderer who so requests of the reasons of the rejection of his application or his tender, and, in the case of a tender, the name of the successful tenderer' without mentioning any review procedure in respect of the award decision.

74 That provision is, however, identical to Article 5a(1) of Directive 89/440, cited above, which, as we have just seen, in the Council's view did not contain any specific provisions on remedies.

75 I would add, moreover, that one could ask oneself why the Council would impose such a short time-limit for the administration to reply to the queries of unsuccessful tenderers, namely 15 days, if the purpose was not that the latter should be informed within sufficient time to enable them it to have the decision set aside before it was too late and the contract was awarded.

76 For the above reasons, I would propose the following reply to the first question.

77 The combined provisions of Article 2(6) and (1)(a) and (b) of the review directive are to be interpreted as meaning that the Member States are required to ensure that the contracting authority's decision prior to the conclusion of the contract as to the bidder with which, in the light of the procedure's results, it will conclude the contract (i.e. the award decision) is in all cases open to a procedure whereby an applicant may have that decision set aside if the relevant conditions are met, notwithstanding the possibility, once the contract has been concluded, of limiting the legal effects of the review procedure to an award of damages.

Question 2

78 By the second question the Bundesvergabeamt in effect asks whether the provisions of Article 2(1)(a) and (b) of the review directive as interpreted above are capable of having direct effect.

79 The respondent in the main proceedings and the Austrian Government consider that the review directive leaves a margin of discretion to the Member States to determine the bodies competent to perform the review procedures required by the review directive.

80 That obligation is not therefore sufficiently precise and unconditional so as to give rise to direct effect.

81 The applicants in the main proceedings state that, to the contrary, the content of the obligation on the Member States is clear and precise and that the Member States therefore have no discretion in the matter. Their margin for manoeuvre is confined to the choice of competent body.

82 The Commission refers, first of all, to the settled case law of the Court on the subject of direct effect. This establishes that: (8)

` ... wherever the provisions of a directive appear, as far as their subject-matter is concerned, to be unconditional and sufficiently precise, those provisions may, in the absence of implementing measures adopted within the prescribed period, be relied upon as against any national provision which is incompatible with the directive or in so far as the provisions of the directive define rights which individuals are able to assert against the State.'

83 In particular, `... the right of a State to choose among several possible means of achieving the result required by a directive does not preclude the possibility for individuals of enforcing before the national courts rights whose content can be determined sufficiently precisely on the basis of the provisions of the directive alone.'

84 It is undeniable in the present case that the content of the Member States' obligation is clearly determined. They are required to ensure that unsuccessful tenderers are able to initiate proceedings to have the decision awarding the contract set aside.

85 It is also clear that this obligation necessarily gives rise to rights for individuals since it is they who must be able initiate the review procedures required by the review directive. (9)

86 Consequently the only question which remains to be decided is whether the fact that the Member States have a margin of discretion when establishing suitable bodies means that the provision in question cannot have direct effect.

87 The Commission rightly points out in this context that this question has already been raised in Dorsch Consult (10) and HI (11) as well as in a number of other cases. (12) It follows from that case-law that the Member States' margin for manoeuvre when organising the review system prevents the review directive from having direct effect.

88 The Commission submits however that the present case differs fundamentally from the cases cited above. This is because the Austrian authorities have already used their margin for manoeuvre and definitively established the bodies and procedures intended to implement the provisions of the review directive, whilst in all of the abovementioned cases the national legislation in question did not include the necessary attributions of competence and therefore further action on the part of the national authorities was required.

89 In this case, the situation is quite different, because Paragraph 91 of the BVergG expressly provides that the Bundesvergabeamt is competent to examine the legality of award procedures and decisions within the ambit of the BVergG. For an award of damages the matter would be referred to the ordinary courts.

90 The system of competence would therefore appear to be definitively established, all the more so since the national law sets out all of the review procedures laid down in Article 2(1) of the review directive. The national legislature has therefore already implemented the obligation to set up a system of review and it is open to individuals to select the competent forum to adjudicate on their complaint.

91 I accept that analysis.

92 The argument derived from the existence of a margin of discretion can, by its very nature, only be raised while that discretion has not been exercised. As soon as it has been exercised that discretion necessarily disappears and can no longer prevent recognition of direct effect.

93 The fact that this discretionary power may not have been exercised in compliance with the review directive is irrelevant in this respect.

94 I consider that a distinction should be drawn between the situation in which a Member State has set up the necessary body, and has only to vest that body with the necessary powers, and that in which no provision has been made to implement the obligation to establish a system of review.

95 The second situation is effectively an insurmountable obstacle to recognition of direct effect. Conversely, in the first case such effect cannot be excluded because the body which will implement the obligation imposed by the review directive already exists.

96 I would add that I also share the Commission's view when it suggests that in the present case it is by no means certain that the applicants need to avail themselves of direct effect. As we have already seen, all of the problems stem from the fact that in practice the decision awarding the contract is announced at the same time as the contract is concluded.

97 That fact does not seem to me to be a necessary consequence of the national provisions because they do not prevent the contracting authority from publishing the award decision a certain time before concluding the contract, nor do they prevent the Bundesvergabeamt from acceding to an application to set that decision aside and ordering, where appropriate, interim measures.

98 That was furthermore confirmed at the oral hearing at which the applicants emphasised, without being contradicted on the point, that certain Austrian public bodies in practice allow a period of time to elapse between the date on which the award decision is notified to the unsuccessful tenderers and the conclusion of the contract.

99 The national provisions in question are capable of being applied so as to comply with the requirements of the review directive. Recourse to the concept of direct effect is therefore unnecessary.

100 It should be noted in passing that that finding clearly does not imply that those provisions constitute a proper implementation of the review directive, that question not being directly in issue in the present case.

101 In the light of the foregoing I would propose that the second question referred to the Court by the Bundesvergabeamt be answered to the effect that the combined provisions of Article 2(6) and (1)(a) and (b) of the review directive are to be interpreted as meaning that the obligations set out therein are sufficiently clear and precise, so that individuals can rely upon them in procedures against the Member State where the Member State in question has adopted definitive rules as to the jurisdiction of review bodies charged with implementing the various phases of the review procedures and has already adopted the necessary procedural rules for each step in the procedure.

Question 3

102 By this question the Bundesvergabeamt asks whether it is required to apply the provisions of Article 2(1)(a) and (b) of the review directive, even if the BVergG contains no provisions to that effect, or conflicting provisions.

103 It should first be noted that this question is closely linked to the preceding question. This is because, like Question 2, it only arises where the issue is one of direct effect and not of the interpretation or application of a national law so as to comply with the review directive.

104 Having said that, I am of the opinion that the Court's case-law provides a ready answer: if a Community law text recognises a right of individuals against the Member State, the national court seised of the matter must give full application to the Community law right and must disapply, so far as may be necessary, any inconsistent provisions of national law.

105 This principal has already been established by judgment in the Simmenthal case (13), in which the Court held that

`a national court which is called upon, within the limits of its jurisdiction, to apply provisions of Community law is under a duty to give full effect to those provisions, if necessary refusing of its own motion to apply any conflicting provision of national legislation , even if adopted subsequently, and it is not necessary for the court to request or await the prior setting aside of such provision by legislative or other constitutional means...' (paragraph 24)

` ... national courts must protect rights conferred by provisions of the Community legal order and... it is not necessary for such courts to request or await the actual setting aside by the national authorities empowered so to act of any national measures which might impede the direct and immediate application of Community rules.' (paragraph 26)

106 I would therefore suggest that the reply to the Bundesvergabeamt's third question should be that the national court which, within the limits of its jurisdiction, must apply the provisions of Community law, is required to guarantee the protection of the rights provided by the Community legal order and to ensure the full effectiveness of those rules by disapplying, of its own initiative where necessary, any conflicting national provision without having to request or await the setting aside by the competent national bodies of any national measures impeding the direct and immediate effect of the Community rules.

Conclusion

107 For the reasons set out above, I propose that the Court should reply as follows to the questions referred to it by the Bundesvergabeamt:

(1) The combined provisions of Article 2(6) and (1)(a) and (b) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts must be interpreted as meaning that the Member States are required to ensure that the contracting authority's decision prior to the conclusion of the contract as to the bidder in a tender procedure with which, in the light of the procedure's results it will conclude the contract (i.e. the award decision), is in all cases open to a procedure whereby an applicant may have that decision set aside if the relevant conditions are met, notwithstanding the possibility, once the contract has been concluded, of limiting the legal effects of the review procedure to an award of damages.

(2) The combined provisions of Article 2(6) and (1)(a) and (b) of Directive 89/665 are to be interpreted as meaning that the obligations set out therein are sufficiently clear and precise so that individuals can rely upon them in procedures against the Member State where the Member State in question has adopted definitive rules as to the jurisdiction of review bodies charged with implementing the various phases of the review procedures and has already adopted the necessary procedural rules for each step in the procedure.

(3) The national court which, within the limits of its jurisdiction, must apply the provisions of Community law, is required to guarantee the protection of the rights provided by the Community legal order and to ensure the full effectiveness of those rules by disapplying, of its own initiative where necessary, any conflicting national provision without having to request or await the setting aside by the competent national bodies national measures impeding the direct and immediate effect of the Community rules.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Saggio delivered on 25 March 1999.
Metalmeccanica Fracasso SpA and Leitschutz Handels- und Montage GmbH v Amt der Salzburger Landesregierung für den Bundesminister für wirtschaftliche Angelegenheiten.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public works contract - Contract awarded to sole tenderer judged to be suitable.
Case C-27/98.

1 By order of 27 January 1998 the Bundesvergabeamt, Republic of Austria, sought from the Court of Justice a preliminary ruling on two questions concerning the interpretation of Article 18 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (hereinafter `the Directive'). (1)

2 The questions are concerned essentially with the compatibility of the Federal Austrian rules on contracts (Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen, hereinafter `the BVergG') with Article 18 of the Directive, which contains the general principles concerning arrangements for awarding contracts, in view of the fact that Article 55(2) of the abovementioned Austrian rules provides that the administration may withdraw a tender notice where, after exclusion of tenders not meeting the legal requirements, only one tender remains. The issue is therefore whether the Directive requires the administration, after examining the suitability of the tenderers, to award the contract even if only one tender has been admitted as valid.

The Community and national provisions

3 The Directive coordinates the national provisions on the award of public works contracts. The preamble indicates that `the simultaneous attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in respect of public works contracts awarded in Member States on behalf of the State, or regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law entails not only the abolition of restrictions but also the coordination of national procedures for the award of public works contracts' (second recital). The next recital adds that `such coordination should take into account as far as possible the procedures and administrative practices in force in each Member State'. The first sentence of the 10th recital makes it clear that `to ensure the development of effective competition in the field of public contracts, it is necessary that contract notices drawn up by the contracting authorities of Member States be advertised throughout the Community'.

4 Title I of the Directive is `General provisions'. Of relevance to this case is Article 8(2), according to which: `The contracting authority shall inform candidates or tenderers who so request of the grounds on which it decided not to award a contract in respect of which a prior call for competition was made, or to recommence the procedure. It shall also inform the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities of that decision.'

Title IV contains the `Common rules on participation'. Under Article 18: `Contracts shall be awarded on the basis of the criteria laid down in Chapter 3 of this title, taking into account Article 19, after the suitability of the contractors not excluded under Article 24 has been checked by the contracting authorities in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing and of technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 26 to 29.'

5 The Austrian rules on public works contracts are contained in the BVergG, which has been in force since 1 January 1994. (2) That Law provides that contracts for works and services must, after accomplishment of the prescribed procedure, be awarded in conformity with the principles of free and fair competition and equal treatment for all bidders and tenderers to authorised, efficient and reliable undertakings at appropriate prices (Article 16(1)). The same Law provides, however, that tendering procedures are required to be concluded only where there is an express provision to that effect (Article 16(5)). Consistently therewith, Article 56(1) of the BVergG provides that the procedure for awarding a public contract terminates upon conclusion of the contract or cancellation of the competition.

The last relevant provision is Article 55(2) of the Austrian Law, whose compatibility with the Directive is at issue in the proceedings before the national court and according to which the contract notice may be withdrawn where, after exclusion of tenders under Article 52, only one tender remains. I would point out for the sake of completeness that Article 52(1) of the BVergG provides that, before the successful tenderer is chosen, the contracting authority, relying on the results of the preliminary inquiries, is required immediately to eliminate tenders submitted by undertakings which fail to fulfil any of the requirements. This involves the exclusion, for example, of tenders submitted without the necessary authorisations, or those which are defective as regards economic, financial or technical capacity or the requisite credibility of the undertaking (paragraph 1), and tenders for which the total price has not been determined plausibly (paragraph 3).

The facts and the questions referred

6 The proceedings before the national court derive from a decision of the Amt der Salzburger Landesregierung (Office of the Federal Government, Salzburg) to publish in spring 1996 a contract notice for the execution of construction works on the A1 Westautobahn. On completion of the requisite procedures, the contract was awarded to the company ARGE Betondecke-Salzburg West. In November of the same year, the same contracting authority, after a further technical evaluation of the works involved, announced a competition for a contract for works along `the carriageway of the Salzburg Westautobahn from km 292.7 to km 297.7, final extension; supply and installation of a steel guard rail'. By tender notice of 24 April 1997, it formally opened the procedure for final award of the contract for the work in question. Following verification of the eligibility of the four competing undertakings, only one was left in contention, namely the consortium comprising Bietergemeinschaft Metalmeccanica Fracasso SpA-Leitschutz Handels- und Montage GmbH. The contracting authority therefore decided to avail itself of the power to terminate the tendering procedure under the abovementioned Article 55(2) of the BVergG. Following an amicable agreement reached in conciliation proceedings before a special federal supervisory commission (Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission), (3) the consortium applied for review under Article 113 of the BVergG. The Third Chamber of the Bundesvergabeamt, to which the matter was assigned, decided to seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following question:

`Is Article 18(1) of Directive 93/37/EEC, according to which contracts are to be awarded on the basis of the criteria laid down in Chapter 3 of Title IV, taking into account Article 19, after the suitability of the contractors not excluded under Article 24 has been checked by contracting authorities in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing and of technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 26 to 29, to be interpreted as requiring contracting authorities to accept a tender even if it is the only tender still remaining in the tendering procedure? Is Article 18(1) sufficiently specific and precise for it to be relied on by individuals in proceedings under national law and, as part of Community law, to be used to oppose provisions of national law?'

The first preliminary question

7 Albeit in the form of a single question, the national court has in fact requested a ruling on two separate points. In the first part of the question, the Austrian judge seeks to ascertain whether Article 18 of the Directive may have an impact on the outcome of the main proceedings. The latter, I repeat, concern the legality of the contracting authority's decision not to complete a tendering procedure in view of the fact that only one tender has been admitted as valid.

8 The Community Directive at issue, like all the directives on contract procedures, which constitute a consistent body of legislation as regards the principles and purposes which they embody and the manner in which their text is drafted, does not give specific guidance on this point. That fact is not surprising, moreover, since the Directive merely seeks to coordinate national procedures and does not purport to lay down exhaustive rules intended to supplant entirely the various national legal systems for the award of contracts. That conclusion follows from the Directive itself: the third recital states that such coordination must `take into account as far as possible the procedures and administrative practices in force in each Member State'.

In the light of that fact, it is reasonable to entertain doubts as to whether the circumstances of this case might not fall outside the scope of the Directive, with the result that the answer to the question should remain within the purview of the Member State, by virtue of the principle just referred to whereby, `[a]s far as possible', national procedures and practices should be respected.

9 That view, attractive though it may be, is not convincing: the Commission, like the governments which have intervened in these proceedings, although considering that the Member States remain free to grant the contracting authorities the power to cancel a competitive procedure, lays emphasis on the risks which might arise if that power were abused.

I consider it reasonable for the Community rules, and in particular, so far as is relevant here, the Public Works Directive, not to be dissociated from the procedures governing cases of that kind in the various national laws. In that regard, it is appropriate to set out briefly the arguments of the parties to these proceedings.

10 The plaintiff in the main proceedings, in expounding its view that the contract must be awarded to the sole remaining tenderer, maintains that a systematic reading of the provisions of the Directive, in particular Articles 7, 8, 18 and 30 - as interpreted, in its view, by the Court (4) - shows that the right of the contracting authority to decline to award a contract or to recommence the procedure must be limited to exceptional and particularly serious cases (death, insolvency and so forth).

The Commission, on the contrary, submits that specifically by virtue of Article 8(2) of the Works Directive, according to which `The contracting authority shall inform candidates or tenderers who so request of the grounds on which it decided not to award a contract in respect of which a prior call for competition was made or to recommence the procedure', the opposite conclusion should be drawn. In its view, that provision shows indisputably that the Directive gives the contracting authority the right to terminate a tendering procedure by cancelling it. Furthermore, the Commission argues, it can clearly be inferred from the rationale of the Directive that it is based on the fundamental requirement of subjecting public works contracts to effective competition (10th recital) or real competition (see Article 22 regarding negotiated procedures), a requirement which would be frustrated by the alleged obligation on the contracting authority to conclude a contract even where there was only one tenderer.

The Amt der Salzburger Landesregierung, the defendant in the main proceedings, also stresses that the fundamental rationale of the Community Directive is to open the public contracts sector to competition and the fact that all the provisions of that Directive, starting with the criteria for awarding contracts in Article 30(1)(a) and (b) of the Directive, presuppose the possibility of comparing a number of tenders.

In addition, the Austrian Government, on the basis of similar arguments, states that Article 18 of the Directive merely lays down a common rule on participation, simply indicating what types of undertaking may be taken into account by the contracting authority for the award of contract.

Finally, the French Government, intervening in the oral procedure, emphasised that under French law also (in particular, under Article 95 ter of the Public Contracts Code) the contracting authority may, in the public interest, decide not to bring a tendering procedure to its conclusion.

11 Then, in the oral procedure, certain parties pointed out that the Court of First Instance recently disposed of a similar question, albeit with reference to the `Services Directive', (5) holding that the contracting authority is not required to bring a public tendering procedure to a conclusion by making an award of contract. (6)

12 I do not consider that the plaintiff's view can be upheld. First, there can be no question of disregarding a requirement such as that contained in Article 8(2), which expressly provides that a decision may be taken not to award a contract. Secondly, I consider that Article 18 is a procedural provision which binds the contracting authority as regards the criteria for awarding contracts (or those in Chapter 3 of the same Title), at the same time laying down common rules for the qualification of tenderers, which is in the nature of a precondition for participation in the procedure. No other conclusion can thus be drawn from Article 18 but that the criteria for the selection of candidates and the grounds for their exclusion from the procedure must be specifically those listed in that provision: to adopt any other interpretation - and particularly one which purports to perceive in the provision an obligation to award a contract even if only one undertaking has presented itself and been found eligible - would simply amount to stretching the legislative provision beyond its proper bounds.

13 Indeed, I think there can be no doubt but that the power to withdraw the administrative notice announcing a tendering procedure is the manifestation of a power vested in the contracting authorities by the laws of the Member States and that, until such time as a final decision awarding a contract is adopted, the contracting authority is essentially free to decline to award a contract on supervening grounds of public interest or because of a reappraisal of the feasibility of the planned works (lack of adequate resources, changes in the state of the art in a particular technological sector, and so forth). (7)

14 The considerations outlined so far do not imply that that power to adopt self-protective measures of that kind is absolute and not amenable to any judicial review. In principle, the comparison of several tenders is not an objective complete in itself, being rather the idea underlying the rules whereby administrative action is rationalised. Consequently, the possibility cannot be excluded that, in certain cases, dealing with a single candidate seeking a contract may produce even better results than recourse to a competition. In fact, whilst it is true that the provisions of the Directive all presuppose a comparison of several tenders, it is also true that, by virtue of Article 18, the administration is required to notify candidates and tenderers of the reasons for which it has decided not to award a contract or to recommence the procedure.

15 In other words, if it cannot be inferred from the Directive that the contracting authority is required in every case to award a contract even where there is only one tender, it must conversely be conceded that that authority may sometimes award a contract, once the procedure has been conducted in accordance with the requirements of publicity and equal treatment contained in the Directive, even if it does so to the only tenderer who presented himself or remained in the procedure, and there can be no possible recourse to a non-existent principle of competition at any cost. In my opinion, the provisions of Article 8(2) of the Directive must be appraised in that light. They are without doubt intended to prevent the contracting authority from freeing itself of a potential contracting party in an entirely arbitrary manner or in disregard of fundamental principles of Community law.

16 As indicated earlier, the conclusion that the Directive does not exclude the possibility of the administration being entitled to withdraw a competition notice was recently upheld by the Court of First Instance with reference to a tendering procedure for a contract for transport services to be provided by chauffeur-driven vehicles, issued by the European Parliament. (8) In a context different from that of the present case (there were several tenders, not just one), the Court of

First Instance stated that `the contracting authority is not bound to follow through to its end a procedure for awarding a contract' (paragraph 54 of the judgment), observing that in that respect the contracting authority enjoys a broad discretion provided that its decision is in no way arbitrary (paragraph 60).

I am of the opinion that, although that case concerned the Services Directive, the principle is certainly sound and may be extended to the Public Works Directive, and also to all the other directives concerning contracts, the principle being a general one which is to be found in the legal traditions of the Member States, which those directives purport to respect.

17 It should be added, however, that the obligation to state the reasons for which the contracting authority decided not to award the contract or to recommence the procedure, referred to in Article 8(2) of the Directive, must be seen for what it is. It allows the legality of the administrative decision to be reviewed, at least in cases where the decision cancelling the procedure appears inappropriate or contrary to other provisions of Community law. That would be the case where, for example, the contracting authority adopted measures solely in order to waste time and purposely create urgency, which it then disingenuously invoked in order to award the contract under a negotiated procedure, doing so in breach of the Community rule that the urgency must not in any event be attributable to the contracting authorities (see Article 7(3)(c) of the Directive).

As far as this case is concerned, the withdrawal of the tender notice could in theory be seen as arbitrary if the contracting authority were to cancel the procedure not with a view to arriving at a less onerous technical solution than that originally envisaged, as in fact occurred in this case, but rather on the basis of alleged inappropriateness of the tender, which in fact had previously been considered abnormally low but had been found to be in order after the examination procedure referred to in Article 30(4) of the Directive was completed.

18 In short, therefore, it seems to me to be indisputable that the contracting authority may on occasion, on grounds of public interest, cancel a public tendering procedure and decline to award a contract where only one tender has been submitted or survived the preliminary stage, provided that the action taken is not arbitrary or unfair and does not involve any infringement of the Directive or of other provisions or principles of Community law.

19 I therefore propose that the Court rule in reply to the first preliminary question that Article 18 of Directive 93/37 does not preclude national legislation which allows a contracting authority to cancel a tendering procedure where, following the lawful exclusion of tenders not accepted as valid, only one tenderer remains in the procedure.

20 By its second question, the national court asks whether Article 18(1) of the Directive may be relied on in the national courts.

21 It should be pointed out that this question is relevant - in the national court's view - only if Article 18 is interpreted in the manner proposed by the plaintiff in the main proceedings. In the light of the answer given to the first question, the second has become academic.

Nevertheless, I shall answer the question, merely stating that the answer must be in the affirmative. Article 18 imposes on the contracting authority unconditional and sufficiently precise obligations for it to be relied on by individuals before national courts. I would add that the same view has already been taken by the Court on previous occasions, albeit in relation to the equivalent provision of the previous version of the Directive. (9)

22 I therefore propose that the Court rule in response to the second question that Article 18 of Directive 93/37 is sufficiently clear and precise to be relied on before a national court.

23 For the foregoing reasons, I suggest that the Court answer the questions submitted by the Bundesvergabeamt as follows:

(1) Article 18 of Directive 93/37/EEC concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts does not preclude national legislation which allows the contracting authority to cancel the tendering procedure where, following lawful exclusion of tenders not accepted as valid, only one tenderer remains in the procedure.

(2) Article 18 of Directive 93/37/EEC is sufficiently clear and precise to be relied on before a national court.

(1) - OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54, recently amended by European Parliament and Council Directive 97/52/EEC of 13 October 1997 (OJ 1997 L 328, p. 1).

(2) - The Law was republished following codification of the provisions on public works contracts by the Law of 27 May 1997, in BGBl. No 56/1997.

(3) - Articles 109 and 110 of the BVergG.

(4) - The applicant in the main proceedings refers in particular to Case 76/81 Transporoute [1982] ECR 417, Joined Cases 27/86, 28/86 and 29/86 CEI [1987] ECR 3347, Case 31/87 Beentjes [1988] ECR 4635, and Case C-304/96 Hera [1997] ECR I-5685.

(5) - Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1).

(6) - Case T-203/96 Embassy Limousines [1998] ECR I-4239.

(7) - Once again with reference to the case of a single tenderer, it may be noted that in Italy the rules on State accounts - which have been extended by the case-law to all public authorities - even provides that a public tendering procedure must be declared void if it does not attract at least two tenderers, `except where the administration has indicated, in the contract notice, that since the procedure will be based on sealed tenders, a contract will be awarded even if only one tender is submitted' (Article 69 of Royal Decree No 827 of 23 May 1924). For a recent application of that provision, see the decision of the Corte dei Conti of 27 February 1997, No 33, in Riv. Corte dei Conti, volume 1, p. 36.

(8) - Case T-203/96 Embassy Limousines, cited above.

(9) - Beentjes, cited above, paragraph 44.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Jacobs delivered on 24 February 2000.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Directive 93/38/EEC - Public works contracts in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors - Electrification and street lighting works in the département of the Vendée - Definition of work.
Case C-16/98.

1. The issue in this case concerns the basis for calculating the value of a works contract in order to determine whether the Community provisions on procurement procedures apply. Specifically, where contracts for work on electricity supply and street lighting networks are to be carried out in a number of localities within the same overall administrative area, are all or any of them to be aggregated for the purposes of Council Directive 93/38 (the Directive) when, although awarded by separate local authorities, they are supervised and coordinated by a single agency set up by those authorities to provide technical and administrative support, when the content of the contracts is largely identical for each type of network and similar as between them, when the work is to be carried out over the same period and when the invitations to tender are all published simultaneously?

The relevant provisions of the Directive

2. The Commission alleges a failure to fulfil the obligations laid down by Article 4(2), Article 14(1), (10) and (13) and Articles 21, 24 and 25 of the Directive. A number of the definitions given in Articles 1 and 2 are also relevant.

3. Article 1(1) defines, inter alia, public authorities as the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, or associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law. Under Article 2(1), the Directive is to apply to contracting entities which: (a) are public authorities... and exercise one of the activities referred to in paragraph 2;.... Those activities include the provision or operation of fixed networks intended to provide a service to the public in connection with the production, transport or distribution of electricity, or the supply of electricity to such networks.

4. Article 4(2) provides: Contracting entities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different suppliers, contractors or service providers.

5. Article 14 provides:

1. This Directive shall apply to contracts the estimated value, [net] of VAT, for which is not less than:

...

(c) ECU 5 000 000 in the case of works contracts.

10. The basis for calculating the value of a works contract for the purposes of paragraph 1 shall be the total value of the work. "Work" shall mean the result of building and civil engineering activities, taken as a whole, which are intended to fulfil an economic and technical function by themselves.

In particular, where a supply, work or service is the subject of several lots, the value of each lot shall be taken into account when assessing the value referred to in paragraph 1. Where the aggregate value of the lots equals or exceeds the value laid down in paragraph 1, that paragraph shall apply to all the lots. However, in the case of works contracts, contracting entities may derogate from paragraph 1 in respect of lots the estimated value net of VAT for which is less than ECU 1 million, provided that the aggregate value of those lots does not exceed 20% of the overall value of the lots.

...

13. Contracting entities may not circumvent this Directive by splitting contracts or using special methods of calculating the value of contracts.

6. Articles 21, 24 and 25 of the Directive fall within Title IV, Procedures for the award of contracts. Article 21(1) provides that calls for competition are to be made by means of a notice drawn up in accordance with one of the annexes to the Directive, which is to be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities (the OJEC) in accordance with Article 21(5). The relevant annex in the present case is Annex XII, which lists in detail the information to be provided. Under Article 24(1), contracting entities which have awarded a contract are to communicate the results of the awarding procedure to the Commission within two months of the award, again by means of a notice drawn up in accordance with one of the annexes (in the present case Annex XV), to be published in the OJEC in accordance with Article 24(2). Under Article 25(1), contracting entities must be able to supply proof of the date of dispatch of both of the above types of notice. Article 25(5) prohibits publication in any other way before notices are dispatched to the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities.

Facts

7. In the French département of Vendée, various municipal authorities have formed syndicats intercommunaux (joint municipal groupings) for the purpose of administering their electricity supply networks. In 1950, all of those syndicats intercommunaux and two individual municipalities (hereinafter all referred to together as the local entities) set up a syndicat départemental, now known as the Syndicat Départemental d'Electrification de la Vendée or by its acronym SYDEV. The local entities did not thereby cease to exist, but SYDEV took over responsibility for certain of their tasks. It appears from documents produced by the French Government that SYDEV's competences were governed at the material time (1994-95) by an arrêté préfectoral (prefectoral order) of 3 October 1960, although the relevant provisions were subsequently modified (in 1997).

8. Under Article 1 of the 1960 arrêté préfectoral, SYDEV's objects were to include:

(1) joint exercise of the rights conferred on local authorities by statute or regulation as regards the production, transport, distribution and use of electrical energy, in particular under the Law of 8 April 1946 on the nationalisation of electricity and gas, and of all the responsibilities conferred on the member syndicats and municipalities;

(2) joint organisation of the services which they are to provide in order to ensure the proper operation and best possible exploitation of their distribution of electricity;

(3) in general, interest and participation, where appropriate, in all activities pertaining to electricity and its use within the framework of the laws and regulations in force.

9. Article 2 gives a non-exhaustive list of the activities in which SYDEV was to engage in pursuit of those objects. They include: representing the member authorities; organising administrative, legal and technical planning and research services; drawing up the general inventory of the requirements of the département and promoting the general and periodic programmes of works relating to electricity infrastructure in the communes; harmonising the rates charged for electricity; entering into agreements with electricity operators holding a concession; and implementing technical and financial measures.

10. Under SYDEV's 1997 statutes, but not under the 1960 arrêté préfectoral, it is to act both as maitre d'oeuvre (supervisor/manager) and as maitre d'ouvrage (contracting authority) on behalf of its members.

11. On 21 December 1994, SYDEV sent for publication in the Bulletin Officiel des Annonces des Marchés Publics (the official French bulletin of notices concerning public works and service contracts, the BOAMP) invitations to tender for a number of works contracts, 37 of which are in issue in the present case. The contracts in question related to extension and maintenance work to be carried out, over a period of three years, on existing electricity supply and/or street lighting networks under the responsibility of the members of SYDEV. All the invitations to tender were published in the BOAMP on 12 January 1995.

12. The notices to which this case relates involve 20 of SYDEV's 23 members and, in all but three cases, there are notices for both electrification and street lighting works for each member. In numerical terms, they thus cover some 80% of all the electricity supply and street lighting networks in the département.

13. In all the notices published in the BOAMP for the 37 contracts in question, the awarding body was stated to be SYDEV and tenders were to be sent to the Works Department of SYDEV at its address, although the name of the local entity concerned was to be added in each case. The description of the work to be carried out on the electricity supply networks was the same in all cases: electrification work and associated generated work such as, for example, civil engineering on the telephone network, civil engineering on the cable television network, the public address system. The work on the lighting networks was described in all cases as: street lighting work and associated generated work such as, for example, the public address system.

14. In most of the notices published in the BOAMP, the estimated value of each individual contract over three years was below the threshold of ECU 5 000 000 (equivalent, at the material time, to FRF 33 966 540) for the application of the Directive to works contracts. Their aggregate value was, however, FRF 609 000 000 (FRF 483 000 000 for the electrification contracts and FRF 126 000 000 for the lighting contracts). For one of the electrification contracts and 13 of the lighting contracts, the estimated value was below the threshold of ECU 1 000 000 (equivalent to FRF 6 793 308 at the material time) for the derogation in the second half of the second subparagraph of Article 14(10) of the Directive, subject to their aggregate estimated value being also less than 20% of the relevant total.

15. Five of the electrification contracts were nevertheless for an estimated value in excess of the ECU 5 000 000 threshold, and notices regarding those contracts and one other slightly below the threshold (for FRF 30 000 000) were sent by SYDEV for publication in the OJEC. Although the requests for publication were sent on SYDEV's headed paper, the notices bore, first, the name of the local entity in question, followed by an indication that the work was to be supervised by SYDEV. Again, tenders were to be sent to SYDEV at its address, with the name of the local entity to be added in each case. The six notices were published in the OJEC on 6 January 1995, although the information provided (identical to that published in the BOAMP) was insufficient to enable all the headings set out in Annex XII to the Directive to be completed. In each case, the name of the contracting entity was published as SYDEV, followed in all but one case by the name of the relevant local entity.

16. The award procedure was of a type comprising three stages. First, a short list of tenderers was drawn up on the basis, it appears from the records of the award procedures produced by the French Government, of whether tenderers had produced all the required certificates as to compliance with administrative requirements and capacity to perform the work in question. Second, one of those tenderers was selected, apparently on the basis of the best offer made. Offers were in the form of a percentage difference from the proposed list of prices, the offer representing the lowest price being accepted in all the cases in respect of which documents have been produced. Finally, the successful tenderer was to be given orders to carry out specific items of work over the three-year period.

17. Notices concerning the award of the 37 contracts with which this case is concerned, including the six published in the OJEC, were published in the BOAMP on 29 September 1995, the body which awarded the contract being identified in each case as SYDEV. No notice concerning the award of any of them was ever sent for publication in the OJEC. In all cases, the notices show that a firm with a local address was awarded the contract. However, at least some of the successful tenderers were in fact large undertakings with branches throughout France; four of the same names were also successful tenderers for similar contracts in Dordogne cited by the Commission in its application. In 10 of the 17 cases where both electrification and lighting work was to be carried out for the same local entity, the same tenderer was awarded both contracts, in three cases one of the contracts was shared with another tenderer and in the remaining four separate contracts were awarded to different tenderers. Overall, there were 10 successful tenderers for the 37 contracts, their success rate ranging from a single shared contract to eight full contracts and two shared contracts, and from FRF 6 000 000 to FRF 114 000 000 plus a share of FRF 48 000 000.

18. The French Government has produced records of the award procedure for the electrification and lighting contracts for three of the local entities on whose behalf an invitation to tender (for the electrification contract) was published in the OJEC. They do not indicate whether any non-local firms submitted tenders (no addresses are given), but it is possible to see that: (i) all the records are presented in an identical format and bear SYDEV's name at the top; (ii) the general terms of the invitations to tender state that the work will be carried out on the territory of the Syndicat, the exact specification of the works to be constructed ["des ouvrages à construire"] being communicated in due course by SYDEV to the contractor chosen; (iii) the members of the boards which opened and decided on the tenders were different for the different local entities (a representative of SYDEV being present on some, though not all, occasions) and tenders were opened on different days or at different times; (iv) the lists of tenderers are similar, though not identical, for the three local entities and for the two types of contract for each of them; and (v) the offers of each individual tenderer for the same type of work in different localities were not always identical.

Procedure

19. On 17 January 1996, its attention having been drawn to the possibility that the above procedures infringed Community law, the Commission sent the French Republic a letter of formal notice alleging that separate lots had been treated as separate contracts, that two-thirds of those contracts had not been notified in the OJEC and that an inappropriate procedure had been used. On 7 April 1997, following the French Government's denials, the Commission sent a reasoned opinion under Article 169 of the EC Treaty (now Article 226 EC) alleging that: (i) inaccurate information of the volume of work had been given, thus discriminating against tenderers from other Member States; (ii) a single programme of works had been split on geographical and technical pretexts in order to avoid publication of a number of lots in the OJEC; (iii) the concepts of contracting entity, association of contracting entities, lots and contracts had been misapplied; and (iv) the procedure used was not provided for in the Directive.

20. On 22 January 1998, the Commission brought the present action, in which it seeks a declaration that in the procurement procedure issued by the Syndicat Départemental d'Electrification de la Vendée in December 1994 for the award of contracts for electrification and street lighting work, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 4(2), 14(1), (10) and (13), and also under Articles 21, 24 and 25, of Directive 93/38/EEC. The Commission and the French Republic presented oral argument at the hearing on 16 November 1999.

Analysis

Applicability of the directive

21. The contracts in issue were advertised and awarded in early 1995. From the Court's judgment in Case C-311/96 Commission v France, it is clear that the Directive had not been transposed in France at that time, but it is not disputed that the relevant authorities should have complied with it or that the Commission is entitled to bring an action concerning an individual instance of failure to comply with a directive which has not yet been implemented.

The alleged infringements

22. The Commission makes two basic claims. First and foremost, it claims that SYDEV separated on both technical and geographical pretexts what was for the purposes of the directive a single works contract into a number of smaller contracts, thereby avoiding for the most part the requirement of publication in the OJEC, misleading potential tenderers as to the true scope of the work and making it appear considerably less attractive for other than local firms to submit a tender, to the disadvantage in particular of tenderers from other Member States. Secondly, it asserts that the notices of invitation to tender sent for publication in the OJEC were incomplete and no notices of the awards were ever sent.

Failure to provide certain details and to send notices of awards

23. The French Government does not, essentially, dispute the second claim, which relates to failure to comply with Articles 21 (as regards the missing information which should have been provided in the notices which were sent to the OJEC), 24 and 25 of the Directive. It admits that the information sent was incomplete and that no notices of the awards were sent. It is thus undisputed that, by failing to provide full details in accordance with Annex XII in respect of the six calls for competition published in the OJEC and by failing to communicate details of the award of those contracts, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 21(1) and 24(1) and (2) of the Directive.

24. However, in view of the admission that no notices were sent other than in respect of the six calls for competition which were published, I do not consider it necessary or appropriate for the Court to make a declaration as regards failure to supply proof of the date of dispatch in accordance with Article 25(1) of the Directive. Nor was there any infringement of Article 25(5) in respect of the notices which were sent, since the documents produced to the Court establish that they were dispatched on the same day to the OJEC and the BOAMP.

Scope of the allegation relating to separate treatment of the contracts

25. The main issue is whether the contracts should have been aggregated for the purposes of Article 14(10) and/or whether their separation constituted illegitimate splitting, contrary to Article 14(13), leading in either case specifically to a failure to publish notices in the OJEC where such notices should have been published under Article 21.

26. In the French Government's view it was correct to treat them all as separate contracts for separate works.

27. The Commission considers that for the purposes of the Directive they should have been treated as lots of the same overall works contract and not separately, whether on a geographical basis (separate contracts for each local entity) or on a technical basis (separate contracts for electrification and lighting).

28. There are three possible configurations in the Commission's allegation: that the electrification and lighting work should have been treated as a whole for each local entity but not for the département, that all the electrification work and all the lighting work should have been treated as two separate wholes for the whole département, or that all the work of both types should have been treated as a single whole for the whole département. The remaining possibility is, of course, that argued for by the French Government.

29. Of the 37 notices with which this case is concerned, five were for an estimated value of over ECU 5 000 000, those five and one more (all for electrification contracts) were in fact published in the OJEC and 14 (all but one of which were for lighting contracts) were for amounts below ECU 1 000 000.

30. If the electrification and lighting contracts had been aggregated for each local entity separately (if separation were justified on geographical but not technical grounds) the value would have risen above the ECU 5 000 000 threshold in only one case - in which a notice was in fact published in the OJEC for the electrification contract (FRF 30 000 000) and the lighting contract was for less than ECU 1 000 000 and 20% of the total for the local entity. Thus, if it were to be found that there were justifiably separate contracts for each local entity, but that the separation between electrification and lighting was not justified, the infringement would be confined to the failure to publish calls for competition for lighting work for the five remaining local entities where notices of the electrification contracts were published and where the lighting contracts were worth more than ECU 1 000 000.

31. If, on the other hand, all the contracts for the département were aggregated in each category (if separation were justified on technical but not on geographical grounds), both categories would be well above the ECU 5 000 000 threshold. One electrification contract (for FRF 6 000 000) would then have been exempt from the need for publication by being under the threshold of ECU 1 000 000 and 20% of the total for electrification. Those of the lighting contracts which fall below the threshold total more than 20% of the total for lighting, but up to six of them could be exempted before that percentage (some FRF 25 000 000) was reached. Thus, if separation were justified on technical but not geographical grounds, the infringement would concern 12 electrification contracts and 12 lighting contracts.

32. Finally, if all the contracts in both categories were aggregated together for the département (if separation were unjustified on either technical or geographical grounds), then all 14 under the ECU 1 000 000 threshold would be exempt from the need for publication because they would amount to less than 20% of the aggregate total. The infringement would thus concern 12 electrification contracts but only 5 lighting contracts.

33. It is therefore necessary to look at both types of separation because the effects of the three possible approaches to aggregation would be different.

Article 14(10) and Article 14(13): aggregation and splitting

34. It will be recalled that Article 14(1) provides that the Directive is to apply to works contracts for an estimated value of at least ECU 5 000 000. Under Article 14(10), where work is the subject of several lots, it is the aggregate value of all the lots which is to be taken for the purposes of Article 14(1). Article 14(13) provides that contracting entities may not circumvent the Directive by splitting contracts.

35. It might be thought that those provisions of Article 14(10) and Article 14(13) express the same rule in different terms. I consider, however, that they should be distinguished.

36. Article 14(10) sets out purely objective criteria on the basis of which it may be determined whether the Directive applies. The term work is defined and it is the total value of that work, arrived at where necessary by aggregating the values of any lots into which it may be divided, which determines the need to comply with the provisions of the Directive.

37. Article 14(13), on the other hand, introduces a subjective element. It speaks of circumventing the Directive by specific types of conduct, namely splitting contracts or using special methods of calculating value. That wording implies a degree of intent in the conduct adopted. Circumvention, like the equivalent concepts used in other language versions, involves deliberate conduct rather than a fortuitous escape. Both the splitting of contracts and the use of special methods of calculation require some intention on the part of the splitter or calculator.

38. It is also true, however, that Article 14(13) of Directive 93/38 appears to contrast with the equivalent provision (Article 6(4)) of Directive 93/37, adopted on the same day, which provides: No work or contract may be split up with the intention of avoiding the application of this Directive (my emphasis). Nevertheless, I consider that the difference is not significant; the import is the same and there is no indication of any will on the part of the legislature to remove the element of intent from the prohibition. Had that been the case, a more neutral wording would certainly have been chosen. It may be noted in this connection that the Commission's Guide to the Community rules on public works contracts, produced in response to a request by the Court, states of the prohibition in Directive 93/37 that it catches any splitting which is not justified on objective grounds and is thus solely designed to circumvent the rules laid down in the Directive.

39. I thus take the view that a breach of Article 14(13) cannot be established in the absence of intent.

40. Article 14(13), moreover, prohibits the splitting of contracts. That concept, in addition to emphasising the element of intent, presupposes the existence of a contract which would, in the normal course of events, have been treated as a single whole but which has been - abnormally - divided into separate contracts.

41. Has the Commission established that the contracts in issue would normally have been treated as a whole by the relevant entities but were deliberately separated to circumvent the application of the Directive?

42. I consider that it has not.

43. On the contrary, no evidence has been put forward that the practice of SYDEV or the various local entities was any different in relation to the contracts in issue in the present case from what it would otherwise have been. The documents produced by the French Government are consistent with its contention that the course followed was the normal one in Vendée and no evidence to the contrary has been submitted by the Commission. At the hearing, the French Government made the point that, had there been any intention to circumvent the Directive, an effort would have been made to do so more discreetly.

44. The Commission's references to practices followed in two other départements are of no particular relevance in that regard, in the absence of evidence of any consistent practice systematically applied throughout France. Nor is it relevant whether, as the Commission alleges, common sense may dictate that electricity supply and street lighting work should be dealt with together - a matter which I shall examine more fully in the context of Article 14(10) - unless it is established that they were deliberately separated in defiance of such an approach. And common sense is often an elusive guide.

45. For an allegation of breach of Article 14(13) to be successful, it would be necessary to establish an intent to circumvent the provisions of the Directive, possibly on the basis of a departure from what would otherwise have been the practice. No specific evidence of either has been produced by the Commission, nor in my view can they be inferred from the circumstances as a whole, which I shall analyse in greater detail below. I thus consider that the Court should not find that in this instance the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 14(13) of the Directive.

46. None of the foregoing, however, detracts from the possibility that the provisions of the Directive should have applied on objective grounds in accordance with Article 14(10) thereof and that the French Republic may have failed to fulfil its obligations thereunder. The examination of that provision will, therefore, be crucial in my analysis.

Identity of the contracting entity

47. First, however, it is necessary to consider a matter debated at some length between the parties: is it significant whether there was, for the purposes of Community law, a single contracting entity (SYDEV) or a number of separate contracting entities (SYDEV's members, the local entities)?

48. The French Government's point of view is, essentially, that it is impossible to separate the question of the unity of the work involved from that of the unity of the contracting entity; there cannot be a single work where there are separate contracting entities. It has thus argued, vigorously, that each local entity was a separate contracting entity (a maitre d'ouvrage in French law) whereas SYDEV was legally incapable at the material time of acting other than as a technical supervisor, manager and coordinator of the different works (as maitre d'oeuvre).

49. The Commission, after appearing to seek to refute that argument, asserting that the true contracting entity was SYDEV in all cases, stated in response to a question at the hearing that the identity of the contracting entity was not in its view an essential factor in the application of Article 14(10) of the Directive, the aggregation requirement in which could apply also to contracts awarded by a number of different contracting entities, provided that they were for a single work within the meaning of that provision.

50. I agree with that latter view.

51. The definition of work in Article 14(10) makes no reference to the identity of the contracting entity and it is logical that it should not. The aim of the Directive, as is clear from its preamble, its provisions and the surrounding context of other Community public procurement legislation, is to open up the market to Community-wide competition in the areas to which it relates. The principal means which it employs for that purpose are the requirements that standard procedures must be used, that calls for competition must be published at Community level and that there must be no discrimination between tenderers. However, no purpose would be served, and a great deal of unnecessary administrative work would be generated, if those requirements were to apply to all contracts, regardless of their value and of the likelihood that they would interest potential tenderers from other Member States. The thresholds (of ECU 5 000 000 and ECU 1 000 000 for works contracts) are clearly designed to deal with that concern. In order to ensure, though, that those thresholds are effectively observed, there are provisions to prohibit deliberate circumvention (Article 14(13)) and to avert a possible failure to apply them if a single overall works project is subdivided on other - and possibly otherwise legitimate - grounds (in Article 14(10)).

52. The aim is thus to ensure that undertakings in other Member States have the opportunity to tender for contracts or bundles of contracts which, on objective grounds of estimated value, are likely to interest them. Whether such contracts are to be awarded by one contracting entity or by several is not a significant factor in that context. There may well be legitimate reasons, administrative or other, for contracts for portions of a single works project to be awarded separately by different entities, but that will not seriously reduce the interest which the whole project is likely to represent for an appropriately qualified undertaking in another Member State. One might imagine, for example, work to be carried out on a road passing through the territories of different local authorities each having administrative responsibility for a section of highway. The aim of the Directive would not be achieved if its application were to be excluded on the ground that the estimated value of each section was only ECU 3 000 000.

53. It is true that the definition of a works contract in Article 1(4) of the Directive specifies that it is a contract concluded by one of the contracting entities referred to in Article 2 (my emphasis), which might suggest that for the purposes of Article 14 each works contract must be concluded with a separate entity. However, Article 2 refers to contracting entities in the plural, classifying them in two basic categories, those which are public authorities or undertakings and those which are not. It thus seems more probable that the definition in Article 1(4) is intended to refer to contracting entities of one of the types referred to in Article 2. Moreover, as the Commission has pointed out, the definition of public authorities includes associations formed by one or more of such authorities, which means that a contracting entity need not be a single public authority and need not be the body which actually concludes the contract. It is clear also that the criterion of the total value of the work in Article 14(10) is not the value of a single contract, or the provision would be self-defeating. On the basis of those considerations, I suggest that too much significance should not be attached, for the purposes of Article 14, to the use of the singular in Article 1(4).

54. I therefore take the view that, as regards a possible infringement of Article 14(10) of the Directive in the present case, it is not necessary to decide whether there were a number of separate contracting entities or a single contracting entity in the form of SYDEV.

Article 14(10): a single work or several?

55. The crucial point to be decided is whether the contracts awarded separately for electrification and street lighting work by each of the local entities formed a single work - or a number of larger works aggregated either geographically or technically - for the purposes of the Directive and should thus have been treated together.

56. A work is defined in Article 14(10) as the result of building and civil engineering activities, taken as a whole, which are intended to fulfil an economic and technical function by themselves. This is not a particularly precise definition, nor is any specific help to be found in the guidelines produced by the Commission. As one commentator has put it, identifying a single work should be like defining the proverbial elephant: awarding authorities will know one when they see it. In the present case, however, the Court is called upon to provide some guidance on how to recognise an elephant.

57. One possibility is to start from the purpose of the rules laid down in the Directive. As I have stated, that aim is essentially to ensure that undertakings throughout the Community enjoy the opportunity to compete for contracts exceeding a certain fixed threshold value above which it is likely to be economically profitable to do so. Since in several instances contracts for both electrification and street lighting work were awarded to the same tenderer in different localities - from which it may be deduced that, in theory, a single contractor could have performed all the work of both kinds throughout the département - and since seven of the ten successful tenderers were awarded contracts totalling considerably more than ECU 5 000 000, it would seem logical that tenderers from other Member States should have been given an opportunity to compete. At the hearing, the Commission argued that the requirement to treat a number of contracts as forming a single work and to publish them in the OJEC arises when the contracts are so linked that a Community undertaking is likely to regard them as a single economic operation and to wish to tender for the whole, as it claims was the case here.

58. However, I do not consider that to be the correct approach. Article 14(10) refers to the economic and technical function which the contracted activities are intended to fulfil by themselves and not to the interest which a potential tenderer may have in being fully informed, even though one of the overall aims of the Directive is to protect and further that interest. Although the provisions of the Directive should be interpreted in the light of its aims, the criterion here is specific.

It is to the intended economic and technical function that we must look, rather than to the way in which the work may be seen by potential tenderers.

59. I take the criterion set out in Article 14(10) to mean that the boundary between work which must be aggregated for the purposes of the Directive and work which may legitimately be treated separately lies between bundles of contracts which, as regards their intended objective, share a common economic and technical function and those which do not.

60. The Commission's position is, essentially, that the work to be done in the present case formed a multiannual electrification programme covering the whole of Vendée and thus had a single economic and technical function. It stresses that the work descriptions are identical within each category and similar as between categories, with all the work to be carried out over the same period within the same geographical and administrative area. The concept of a work cannot be confined in a case such as the present to that of a specific structure or construction.

61. The French Government contends that separate improvement and extension operations on a number of independent networks cannot be regarded as forming a single work intended to fulfil a single economic and technical function. It considers that, in the absence of a specific structure or construction, it is for the contracting entity to define its needs and thus determine the identity of the work. In the present case, each local entity defined its own needs in respect of its own networks, independently of any hypothetical overall work.

62. Neither of the parties has provided the Court with a very full description of the networks involved. However, it appears from what has been said by the French Government, and not denied by the Commission, that the local entities are responsible for individual low-voltage electricity supply networks radiating from transformer substations and serving consumers within their areas; that those networks are interconnectable; and that the street lighting networks, controlled by the individual local entities, are powered from those electricity supply networks.

- Electrification and street lighting: technical considerations

63. The Commission stresses that the description of both types of work (electrification and street lighting) includes work on the public address system and that both types of work were included in the same invitation to tender published by the bodies equivalent to SYDEV in two other French départements (Calvados and Dordogne) in 1995. The French Government emphasises that the work on the electricity supply network is essentially underground, whereas the street lighting work is essentially above ground, and that the two types of work fall under different headings (civil engineering and installation respectively) in the NACE classification as set out in Annex XI to the Directive. At the hearing, it suggested that work on the street lighting networks might not fall within the scope of the Directive at all, since those networks do not involve the production, supply, transport or distribution of electricity but rather its consumption for the benefit of the public.

64. Of those considerations, I consider only the last to be significant. It highlights - even without there being any need to consider that street lighting falls entirely outside the scope of the directive - the distinction which may legitimately be drawn, in terms of intended economic and technical function, between the two types of network. An electricity supply network is intended, technically, to transport electricity from a supplier to individual end-consumers who, economically, must pay that supplier for what they consume. A street lighting network provides lighting in public places. It is itself an end-consumer of the electricity delivered to it by the electricity supply network. The authority providing the service must itself assume the cost - recovering it, presumably, from the population served through some such means as local taxation rather than on the basis of any individual benefit derived.

65. It is thus clear, in my view, that an electricity supply network and a street lighting network are intended to fulfil different economic and technical functions. That being so, I do not consider that work to maintain, improve and/or extend networks of the two different types, whether in the same area or not, can be treated together as a single work for the purposes of Article 14(10) of the Directive.

66. That conclusion is not outweighed by the other considerations put forward by the Commission. The fact that a public address system is mentioned in both types of invitation to tender, as associated generated work, does not imply a single economic or technical function. Different parts of a public address system may be carried by electricity supply ducts and by street lighting masts, so that work on either network may generate work on that system, without affecting the economic or technical functions of the networks themselves. Nor does the fact that some other contracting entities may have chosen to offer a single contract for work on both types of network determine whether, in principle, such civil engineering activities, taken as a whole, are intended to fulfil a single economic and technical function.

67. It is thus unnecessary to decide for the purposes of this case whether street lighting falls within the scope of the Directive or not, an issue which has in any event not been properly debated before the Court. If it does not, however, then clearly there can be no question of aggregating such work with electrification work for the purposes of the Directive.

68. I conclude that it was not necessary to aggregate the values of the electrification and lighting contracts for the purposes of the Directive, whether for the département as a whole or for each local entity. The question remains, however, whether the contracts should have been aggregated for the whole département for either category individually.

- Electrification: technical and geographical considerations

69. It appears that each local entity is responsible for the electricity supply network in its area, although the networks are interconnected and the electricity is supplied by the national corporation EDF. The Commission stresses the geographical contiguity of the networks, the simultaneity of the work programmes, the identical nature of the work descriptions and the overall coordination by SYDEV. The French Government emphasises above all that each local entity entered into a separate contract for its own network.

70. That latter consideration, I have concluded, is not relevant to the question of determining whether there was a single work for the purposes of the Directive. Indeed, the present situation would appear comparable to the example which I have cited of a public highway passing through the territories of several local authorities. Although, for administrative reasons, the different local entities have responsibility for the low-voltage supply networks within their areas, those interconnectable networks taken as a whole are intended to fulfil a single economic and technical function: the conveyance and sale to consumers of electricity produced and supplied by EDF.

71. It is true that, as the French Government has pointed out, that reasoning would apply to the whole of the national electricity supply system. However, I agree with the Commission that the work in the present case is clearly circumscribed by what one might call the three unities - of place, time and action. All the electrification contracts in issue were for work to be done within the same département over the same period, bearing the same general description and subject to the same technical control. There is no suggestion that there was work of the same nature to be carried out at the same time over any wider area - covering neighbouring départements or regions, or even the whole national network. In particular, it is implausible that any such work would have come under the supervision of SYDEV. Had that been the case, however, then it could indeed have been argued that all such work constituted a single work for the purposes of the Directive. And in that case, I consider, the conclusion would be not the reductio ad absurdum which the French Government seeks to establish but rather that all the invitations to tender would have had to be notified in the OJEC.

72. The fact that the contracts are for a series of separate operations to be carried out at different points in time and space (within the same period of time and the same geographical area) does not mean that they should not be regarded as a single work. If that reasoning were followed, each operation would be a separate work, and not even the French Government has suggested that such should be the case. On the contrary, a series of operations to be carried out within a specified period on a group of networks having a shared economic and technical function must itself be regarded as intended to fulfil a shared economic and technical function. In that connection, it may be recalled that the terms of the 1960 arrêté préfectoral refer to the general inventory of the requirements of the département - a wording which tends to confirm that conclusion.

73. I thus reach the view that all the electrification contracts in issue formed a single work within the meaning of Article 14(10) of the Directive. Their values should have been aggregated for the purpose of determining whether calls for competition should have been published in the OJEC. Six such calls were in fact published, and one other contract was for an estimated value lower than ECU 1 000 000 and 20% of the total, thus qualifying for a derogation in accordance with the second subparagraph of Article 14(10). The failure to publish notices of the remaining 12 contracts, however, all for estimated values above that threshold and totalling somewhat over ECU 26 000 000, constituted an infringement of the Directive.

74. That infringement involved a failure to comply with not only Article 14(1) and (10) of the Directive, as regards the calculation of the value of the work, but also Article 21(1) and (5), because notices were not drawn up and sent for publication in the OJEC, and Article 25(5), because notices were published in the BOAMP.

- Street lighting: technical and geographical considerations

75. I find it more difficult to apply the same reasoning to the work to be carried out on the street lighting networks. It is certainly true that the economic and technical function of each individual network is the same as that of all the others, but I do not consider that they thereby share a common function.

76. Whilst we have not been given any specific account of how street lighting is organised in Vendée, I think it not unreasonable to assume that the networks are independent of each other, as the French Government says. Since street lighting is an activity which consumes electricity, for which each local entity responsible must pay, there would not appear to be any purpose in interconnection, in contrast to the situation as regards the electricity network, which is a supply system with a single supplier. Each network is likely to be supplied from a separate point on the electricity supply system, enabling the consumption of each local entity to be determined. Lighting is, moreover, generally confined to built-up areas. Where such areas are separated by open countryside, as may well be predominantly the case in a largely rural département such as Vendée, the different networks are unlikely to be contiguous. Different local entities may, furthermore, take quite different approaches to street lighting: some may seek to provide as generous a service as possible, whereas others may wish to save ratepayers' money by providing a strict minimum.

77. It is true that the above considerations are largely conjectural with regard to the specific circumstances of the present case. However, the French Government has stressed the mutual independence of the individual networks, and the Commission has produced no evidence to the contrary. In particular, there is no evidence of any unifying economic factor such as might be provided by, for example, a uniform system of local taxation throughout the département to pay for the cost of the lighting.

78. I thus consider that the Commission has not established the existence of a shared economic and technical function within the meaning of Article 14(10) of the Directive and that it was not necessary to aggregate the values of all the street lighting contracts in order to determine whether the Directive was applicable, even assuming that street lighting falls within the scope of the Directive.

Article 4(2): discrimination between contractors

79. The Commission's argument here is essentially that, by wrongly publishing only a selection of the invitations to tender in the OJEC, the French authorities placed tenderers from other Member States at a disadvantage since such tenderers, being unaware of the total value of the work and the extent to which it might interest them, would either decide not to compete or allow for proportionately higher fixed costs and thus submit less attractive bids than undertakings having gleaned fuller knowledge of the scope of the work from the BOAMP. The French Government, although it relies principally on its denial of any artificial splitting, asserts that there was no discrimination between tenderers, who were all required to bid a percentage difference from the estimated value of different categories of work with a view to carrying out specific items of work to be determined in the future.

80. Since Article 4(2) prohibits discrimination specifically between suppliers, contractors or service providers, it might be wondered whether it extends also to discrimination between tenderers or, a fortiori, potential tenderers (since we have not been informed that any undertaking from another Member State in fact submitted any tender in this case).

81. I consider that it does. For one thing, the terms supplier, contractor and service provider are not defined in the Directive, whereas tenderer is defined in Article 1(6) as a supplier, contractor or service provider who submits a tender. The term contractor is thus not used in the Directive in the sense of one who has been awarded a contract but in the wider sense of one who aspires to be awarded a contract.

82. Indeed Article 4(1) - and it is worth noting that Article 4 is the first substantive provision in the Directive, defining to a certain extent the scope of what follows - requires contracting entities to comply with the Directive when awarding... contracts, or organising design contests. The juxtaposition of awarding and organising suggests that the term awarding too must be taken as embracing the whole procedure rather than just its final stages, and I consider that Article 4(2) must have the same scope.

83. The Court has, moreover, held the principle of equal treatment to be inherent in the original Community directive on public works contracts and embodied in Article 4(2) of Directive 90/531, the direct and almost identically-worded predecessor of Article 4(2) of the present Directive. Although the Court described the principle as that of equal treatment between tenderers, I consider that, by its very nature, it must apply also to those who may be discouraged from tendering because they have been placed at a disadvantage.

84. That being so, and in view of the conclusion I have reached regarding the failure to aggregate the electrification contracts, I consider that the Commission has established a breach of Article 4(2) of the Directive. Regardless of whether in this case tenderers from other Member States would in fact have been attracted - given the obvious desirability of a local establishment and the risk that they might be awarded only a portion of the total work, thus possibly compromising their calculations as to fixed costs - they were prevented from taking a decision on a proper basis because full information of the whole work was not published in the OJEC as it should have been. Tenderers consulting the BOAMP, however, who will have been predominantly French, had fuller information at their disposal.

85. However, with regard to the six calls for competition actually published in the OJEC, the information published in the OJEC was the same as that published in the BOAMP, so that the failure to communicate all the information required by Article 21(1) of the Directive read in conjunction with Annex XII thereto did not entail any discrimination.

Costs

86. Since, in my view, the Commission has established breaches of the Directive in respect of the failure to publish all the required details of the electrification contracts in the OJEC but has failed to establish a breach of Article 14(13) or any breach in respect of the lighting contracts in issue, I consider that, in accordance with Article 69(3) of the Rules of Procedure, the parties should each be ordered to pay their own costs.

Conclusion

87. In view of all the foregoing considerations, I consider that the Court should:

(1) declare that, by failing, in the course of the procurement procedure issued by the Syndicat Départemental d'Electrification de la Vendée in December 1994 for the award of contracts for electrification work:

- to publish a call for competition in the Official Journal of the European Communities for 12 contracts each with an estimated value exceeding ECU 1 000 000 and forming part of a single work within the meaning of Article 14(10) of Council Directive 93/38/EEC, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 4(2), Article 14(1) and (10), Article 21(1) and (5) and Article 25(5) of that directive;

- to provide full details in accordance with Annex XII to Directive 93/38/EEC in respect of six calls for competition published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 21(1) of that directive;

- to communicate details of the award of all the contracts, the French Republic failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 24(1) and (2) of Directive 93/38/EEC;

(2) dismiss the remainder of the application;

(3) order the parties to bear their own costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 16 July 1998.
Connemara Machine Turf Co. Ltd v Coillte Teoranta.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: High Court - Ireland.
Public supply contracts - Definition of contracting authority.
Case C-306/97.

A - Introduction

1 The present request for a preliminary ruling by the High Court of Ireland concerns the question whether, for the purposes of Directives 77/62 (1) and 93/36, (2) Coillte Teoranta can be regarded as a contracting authority. (3)

2 Connemara Machine Turf Company Ltd, the plaintiff in the main proceedings, is engaged in the production of machine cut turf and the sale of chemical fertilisers. The defendant in the main proceedings, the Irish Forestry Board (Coillte Teoranta), was established in December 1988 pursuant to the Forestry Act. The greater part of land dedicated to forestry and formerly owned by the State and the Department of Energy was transferred to Coillte Teoranta. In return, the company shares were transferred to the Minister for Energy, the Minister for Finance, two Government civil servants in trust for the Minister for Finance, and to the Government.

3 On 12 March 1993 Coillte Teoranta invited tenders for the supply of certain fertilisers to the value of IR £165 947. Connemara submitted a tender but was unsuccessful. On 10 March 1994 Coillte Teoranta again invited tenders for the supply of certain fertilisers to the value of IR £232 016. Connemara was again unsuccessful with its tender.

4 Coillte Teoranta failed to comply with the Community-law provisions governing the award of public contracts when it invited the tenders; in particular, no notices were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

5 Connemara argues in its action that those provisions were infringed; Coillte Teoranta, on the other hand, submits that it is not a contracting authority and is therefore not under any obligation to comply with those provisions of Community law.

6 The High Court of Ireland has accordingly referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

`(1) Is the defendant a "contracting authority" within the definition of the term "contracting authorities" contained in Article 1(b) of Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976?

(2) Is the defendant a "contracting authority" within the definition of the term "contracting authorities" contained in Article 1(b) of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993?'

B - Relevant legal provisions

Community law

7 Article 1 of Directive 77/62 provides the following definition of a contracting authority:

`For the purpose of this Directive:

...

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities and the legal persons governed by public law or, in Member States where the latter are unknown, bodies corresponding thereto as specified in Annex I;

...'

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

8 Annex I to Directive 77/62, as amended by Directive 88/295, contains a list of the legal persons governed by public law and bodies corresponding thereto mentioned in Article 1(b). Point VI refers to these as being, in the case of Ireland:

`other public authorities whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State'.

9 Directive 77/62 was repealed by Directive 93/36. This new directive required to be transposed in national law by 14 June 1994. It had not been transposed in Ireland by that date. It should once more be borne in mind that the tendering procedures had been completed before that date.

10 The concept of a contracting authority is henceforth defined as follows in Article 1:

`For the purpose of this Directive:

...

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

"a body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law;

...'

11 The relations between the Department of Agriculture, Food and Forestry, the Department of Finance and the shareholders of Coillte Teoranta are defined by the Forestry Act 1988 and by the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the company itself. For reasons of clarity, it will be necessary to return to the individual provisions of those rules during the examination of what constitutes a contracting authority.

C - Analysis

12 The question first arises as to which provisions of Community law are applicable. The national court making the reference seeks an interpretation of Directives 77/62 and 93/36.

13 It is common ground that Directive 77/62, as amended by Directive 88/295, is relevant. In the view of Coillte Teoranta, the Irish, United Kingdom and French Governments, however, Directive 93/36 or its underlying premisses should also be enlisted for the purpose of reaching a decision in the case.

14 It should, however, be pointed out that the latter directive did not require to be transposed until 14 June 1994 and that Ireland had not yet done so by 22 July 1994. (4) The invitations to tender, however, were made in March 1993 and 1994, and thus at a time when Directive 93/36 had not yet been transposed in Irish law and also did not yet require to be so transposed.

15 It is extremely doubtful to what extent the directive which is later in time can be used for the purpose of interpreting the earlier directive. The above parties, which submit that the Court should proceed in such a manner, rely in this regard on the recitals in the preamble to Directive 93/36, according to which that directive was adopted primarily for reasons of clarity. For that reason, they claim, there should be no problem in construing the earlier provisions in the light of the new version or in assessing the facts of the case on the basis of the new definition.

16 First, it should be noted in this regard that the wording of the definition of a contracting authority in Directive 93/36 has been substantially extended and now contains individual features which were nowhere mentioned in the earlier version.

17 The first recital in the preamble to Directive 93/36 does admittedly mention that a new version is required for reasons of clarity. This, it is stated, is necessary since Directive 77/62 had in the past been amended on a number of occasions and further amendments were subsequently to be made. In this way, it was intended to achieve an alignment with the provisions on the award of contracts for public works and service contracts. (5) According to the third recital, however, this alignment relates also to the introduction of a functional definition of contracting authorities. On an a contrario reading, however, this means that the definition which has now been given need not necessarily be identical with that which previously applied, and extreme caution should therefore be taken in using it as an aid to interpretation. The new directive, which has also repealed and replaced Annex I to the old version, contains in its definition of a contracting authority additional matters which do not merely amplify the previous definition or general thinking on the topic but also constitute modifications which go further and cannot be applied retroactively. Furthermore, in interpreting a provision of Community law it is necessary to consider its wording, its context and its aims. (6) For the present case, therefore, it follows that the facts may be assessed solely on the basis of Directive 77/62.

18 In the view of Connemara, the United Kingdom and French Governments, as well as the Commission, Coillte Teoranta is a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 77/62, with the result that notice of the supply contracts required under Article 9 of the directive to be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, something which, however, was not done in this case.

19 In support of this contention, it is submitted that Coillte Teoranta fulfils important public functions, such as the conservation of national forests and the support of forestry development in Ireland. Coillte Teoranta owns 12 national parks and makes leisure facilities available at more than 180 locations throughout Ireland. In order to meet those objectives, the company was established by statute and financially provided for by the Irish Government. It also follows from its Memorandum and Articles of Association that the Government appoints the Board and its Chairman and that the company's finances are controlled by the Government.

20 Against this, Coillte Teoranta and the Irish Government argue that it is simply a State-owned private undertaking. Although the State has a majority shareholding, it does not exercise any influence over the day-to-day running of the company. Coillte Teoranta is required under the Forestry Act to carry on its business in a commercial manner. State influence is limited to general commercial policy, in the same way as that which any majority shareholder in any other company might exercise. The objectives and tasks of the company, however, are exclusively commercial in nature. Coillte Teoranta is thus in competition with other undertakings and is in no different position whatever compared with those undertakings. If Coillte Teoranta makes its facilities and property available to the public for leisure and recreational purposes, this is done on commercial grounds, since the benefit derived from these activities exceeds the costs. In short, neither Coillte Teoranta itself nor the conclusion by Coillte Teoranta of contracts with other undertakings is subject to influence by the State in excess of that which majority shareholders in other companies would be recognised as having.

21 As already mentioned, the State, regional or local authorities, and - in the case of Ireland - other public authorities under Point VI of Annex I whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State constitute contracting authorities for the purposes of Article 1(b) of Directive 77/62.

22 This means that in the present case it is first necessary to examine whether Coillte Teoranta can be subsumed within the concept of the `State'.

23 In connection with such an examination, the Court was called on in the Beentjes case (7) to determine the status of a body which did not have any separate legal personality, the functions and composition of which were regulated by statute and whose members were appointed by a committee of the Province in question. It was required to apply rules laid down by a central committee established by a State decree and the members of which were appointed by the Government. The State ensured compliance with the obligations arising from the body's legal transactions and financed the public works contracts which it awarded.

24 The legislation applicable at that time was Directive 71/305; (8) however, the definition of a contracting authority contained therein also corresponds to that found in Directive 77/62.

25 In Beentjes, the Court concluded that the concept of the State, as used in the directive, fell to be interpreted in functional terms. (9) The aim of the directive was, for the Court, to ensure `... the effective attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in respect of public works contracts...'. (10) The Court accordingly concluded that the body at issue in that case had to be regarded as coming within the notion of the State, since its composition and functions were laid down by legislation and it was dependent on the authorities for the appointment of its members, the observance of the obligations arising out of its measures and the financing of the public works contracts which it was its task to award. That, the Court ruled, was the case even though the body was not part of the State administration in formal terms. (11)

26 A similar approach should be taken in the present case. The objective of the directive here relevant does not differ in any essential respects from that at issue in Beentjes. According to the first and second recitals in its preamble, Directive 77/62 is designed to ensure better supervision of the prohibition of restrictions on the free movement of goods in regard to public supply contracts. In addition, the directive - according to the 12th recital in its preamble - set itself the task of developing effective competition in the field of public contracts. In order, however, to guarantee competition free from any discrimination, those to whom the directive is addressed - namely, the contracting authorities - must be determined in a functional and not exclusively a formal perspective.

27 In functional terms, Coillte Teoranta cannot be regarded as part of the State. Admittedly, the company was established by statute and provided with financial means by the public authorities, it must consult with the Minister for Finance in regard to issues of forestry development in areas of economic interest, its directors are Government appointees, and the annual plan for the sale of land and timber must be agreed with the Government.

28 Coillte Teoranta does, however, have a separate legal personality. The public contracts which it awards are financed out of the company's capital, which, although originally provided by the State, has in the meantime also been guaranteed through private commercial activities. No public contracts are awarded at the expense of the State. All things considered, State influence on the business activities of Coillte Teoranta must be regarded as being appreciably less than was the case with regard to the facts underlying Beentjes. The functional approach thus does not point to the company's being dependent on the State in such a way as to justify the conclusion that it constitutes part of the State.

29 Once it is held that Coillte Teoranta, in accordance with the view here expressed, cannot be subsumed within the notion of the State under Article 1(b) of Directive 77/62, it remains to be examined whether it may be a public authority whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State within the meaning of Annex I. The decisive factor in this, apart from looking after public interests, is the degree of influence which the State may exercise over the award of public contracts.

30 Connemara, the United Kingdom and French Governments, and the Commission take a similar viewpoint to that on the issue previously discussed. They argue that, particularly in view of the fact that the company was established by statute, that its Board is appointed by the Government, and that its initial capital was provided by the State, which continues to control its finances, it follows that Coillte Teoranta is an authority whose public contracts are controlled by the State.

31 Against this, Coillte Teoranta and the Irish Government again point to the commercial character of the company, which finds itself in competition with other private undertakings on the market in question. It does not enjoy any preferential rights such as would give it an advantageous position in relation to others. State influence is limited to that which other shareholders are recognised, or may be recognised, as having. In legal terms, the State has no possibility of influencing day-to-day business, nor has it ever attempted to exercise such influence. Coillte Teoranta is treated under company law in the same way as any other company. Its activities are directed at making profits and are independent of ministerial instruction.

32 The crucial question is therefore the following: were the public supply contracts which Coillte Teoranta awarded subject to control by the State, in the terms used for Ireland by Annex I to Directive 77/62?

33 Here, too, an approach should be adopted which does not consider the matter merely from the formal aspect. All public undertakings are subject to some form of State control; that, however, is not tantamount to their also being contracting authorities within the meaning of the directive.

34 The concept of public undertakings is to be found in Article 90(1) of the EC Treaty. That provision prohibits Member States from enacting or maintaining in force, in relation to such undertakings, measures that are contrary to Community competition policy. The characteristic feature of public undertakings is that public authorities can influence the course of business. For that purpose, it suffices if there is a possibility of influence being exerted, and such a possibility will always exist if the State holds the greater part of the company capital. (12)

35 Its status as a public undertaking, however, still provides no indication as to whether the public supply contracts which Coillte Teoranta awards are subject to control by the State. Since Annex I to Directive 77/62 refers expressly to State control over public supply contracts, this point requires to be considered in concrete terms. (13) Accordingly, the supply contract in question would, under the relevant provisions, have to be open to State control in such a way that public authorities are able to exert influence on the manner in which the contract is concluded.

36 The State initially provided Coillte Teoranta with its entire company capital. In return, the State received corresponding shares in the company. The annual land and timber sale plan must be agreed with the Department. The company directors are appointed by the competent ministers; investments exceeding a total amount of IR £250 000 require the approval and consent of the competent ministers. The Minister for Energy can set out financial objectives. The company also carries out functions in the public interest, such as the provision of leisure, recreation, sporting, educational, scientific, cultural and holiday facilities on its property. The Board of Directors looks after the day-to-day business of the company, which includes decisions on the award of contracts.

37 There is, however, no provision under which it would be possible for the Minister or any civil servant to instruct the company or its directors to award contracts (possibly on the basis of non-commercial criteria). The company is under an obligation to conduct its business in a cost-effective and economic manner. Its directors are under an obligation to exercise their powers, in accordance with their duty of loyalty to the company, in a manner independent of their own interests. Although the company is required to abide by the principles of national forestry policy, this applies in equal measure to every owner of forest land in Ireland. The directors must submit annually a five-year development plan, indicating in detail the plans regarding management and development of the company and its assets, as well as acquisition and sale of property, forestry objectives and profit forecasts. Here too, the relevant provisions do not grant any powers to the State authorities to intervene for the purpose of regulating the company's day-to-day activities.

38 Therefore, although the criteria mentioned make it possible to point to a general State influence on the company, that influence does not, under the provisions material to the present case, suffice to exercise specific control over the award of public supply contracts. The conclusion of contracts relating to public supplies is not dependent on action by State authorities. Coillte Teoranta is for that reason not a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 77/62.

39 It follows from the foregoing considerations that Coillte Teoranta does not come within the scope of Directive 77/62.

40 Even though Directive 93/36 is not applicable to the present case, given that the contracts were concluded before that directive entered into force, and since that directive also modifies and does not simply clarify, the following may, in the alternative, be noted with regard to the national court's second question. In view of the definition of a contracting authority in Article 1(b), as extended by amendments, it would be necessary to examine whether Coillte Teoranta is a body governed by public law. It would first have to have been established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character. This would probably have to be answered in the affirmative, since Coillte Teoranta also - or primarily - has the function of providing leisure and recreational facilities for the public on its property. Even though these do not represent the company's only functions, this does not affect the outcome, so long as it attends to needs which it is specifically required to meet. (14) In addition, Coillte Teoranta has its own legal personality. If the company's board consists in the majority of State appointees, Coillte Teoranta may well be a contracting authority within the meaning of the new Directive 93/36. As stated above, however, that directive is not applicable to the present case. The second question submitted by the national court does not therefore require to be answered.

D - Conclusion

41 In light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the questions submitted by the High Court of Ireland be answered as follows:

A company such as that described in the order for reference is not a contracting authority within the meaning of Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts.

(2) - Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 1).

(3) - In Case C-353/96, Treaty-infringement proceedings have been brought by the Commission against Ireland, the Commission arguing that Coillte Teoranta failed to publish notice of its invitations to tender. See Advocate General Alber's Opinion of 16 July 1998 in that case ([1998] ECR I-8565, I-8567).

(4) - This becomes apparent from the Irish Government's reply of 22 July 1994 to the Commission's letter of formal notice.

(5) - Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54) and Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1).

(6) - Case C-84/95 Bosphorus v Minister for Transport, Energy and Communications, Ireland and the Attorney General [1996] ECR I-3953, paragraph 11 and the references contained therein.

(7) - Case 31/87 Beentjes v Netherlands State [1988] ECR 4635.

(8) - Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682).

(9) - Beentjes, cited above in footnote 7, paragraph 11.

(10) - Beentjes, cited above in footnote 7, paragraph 11.

(11) - Beentjes, cited above in footnote 7, paragraph 12.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Saggio delivered on 1 October 1998.
Hospital Ingenieure Krankenhaustechnik Planungs-Gesellschaft mbH (HI) v Landeskrankenanstalten-Betriebsgesellschaft.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten - Austria.
Public service contracts - Effect of a directive not transposed into national law.
Case C-258/97.

1 By order of 8 July 1997, the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten (Independent Administrative Senate for Carinthia) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling five questions concerning the interpretation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (`the Review Directive') (1) and Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (`the Services Directive'). (2)

Legislative context

2 Article 1(1) of the Review Directive, as amended by Article 41 of the Services Directive, requires the Member States to take the measures necessary to ensure that decisions taken by contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and rapidly on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

3 Article 2(7) requires the Member States to ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

4 The following paragraph of that article has particular relevance in this case. It will therefore be helpful to reproduce it in full:

`Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.

The members of such an independent body shall be appointed and leave office under the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office, and their removal. At least the President of this independent body shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. The independent body shall take its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard, and these decisions shall, by means determined by each Member State, be legally binding.'

5 A number of provisions of the Services Directive are also relevant to the present case. That directive contains rules for the award of public service contracts, which must be observed within the Community for all public service contracts with a value exceeding the minimum threshold provided for in Article 7. Article 8 requires contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A to be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III, IV, V and VI, whereas those listed in Annex I B are to be awarded in accordance only with Articles 14 and 16. If the contract has as its object services listed in both annexes, the choice of the applicable rules is to be determined by the service with the greater value. The services listed in Annex I A include, in Category No 12, architectural services; engineering services and integrated engineering services; related scientific and technical consulting services; technical testing and analysis services.

6 Under Article 168 of the Act of Accession, (3) both directives should have been transposed into Austrian law by the date of accession, that is, 1 January 1995. The Review Directive was transposed at Federal level by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Federal Law on the Award of Public Contracts), (4) which entered into force on 1 July 1994. At the regional level, each of the nine Länder has adopted its own law on the award of public contracts. In the case of Carinthia, the law in question is the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz, which entered into force on 1 January 1994, (5) Section VIII of which governs the procedures for reviewing award decisions.

Under Paragraph 59 of that Law, the body responsible for review procedures is the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten, an independent administrative authority charged with reviewing the legality of acts of the Land administration (hereinafter: `the UVK'). The Law of 20 November 1990 (the Carinthian Verwaltungssenatsgesetz) (6) governs the powers, composition and operation of the UVK. The provisions of the Austrian Constitution relating to the structure and operation of the independent administrative senates of the Länder are also applicable. (7)

7 The law implementing the Services Directive, (8) which was adopted by the Carinthian Landtag (Parliament of the Land of Carinthia) on 22 April 1997, entered into force on 1 July 1997, that is, after the end of the period provided for in the Act of Accession. That law expressly excludes from its scope procurement procedures already completed and is therefore not applicable to the facts of the main proceedings, which date back to 1996.

Facts and main proceedings

8 The main proceedings concern the award to the company CMT Medizintechnik Gesellschaft mbH, of Vienna, of a service contract relating to the construction of a children's hospital in Klagenfurt. The contract, which was awarded by the Landeskrankenanstalten-Betriebsgesellschaft (the company responsible for the management of regional hospitals), related to a number of engineering services, including planning and consultancy in connection with the installation and operation of various medical facilities.

9 HI Hospital Ingenieure Krankenhaustechnik Planungs-Gesellschaft mbH, of Munich, was a competing tenderer for the same contract. Following its exclusion, it brought review proceedings before the UVK, claiming that the award should be set aside as being in breach of the Community legislation on public service contracts. In particular, it alleged that the conditions included in the contract notice and the rules applied in carrying out the procedure for the award of the contract did not conform with the provisions of the Services Directive.

10 The UVK considered it necessary, in order to resolve the dispute, to refer to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling five questions worded as follows:

`1. Is Article 2(8) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts to be interpreted as meaning that the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten fulfils the conditions for a body responsible for review procedures with respect to services?

2. Are these or other provisions of Council Directive 89/665/EEC on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, from which there derives an individual right to have review proceedings conducted before authorities or courts which comply with the provisions of Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665/EEC, to be interpreted as being sufficiently precise and specific that, in the event of non-transposition of the directive in question by the Member State, an individual may successfully assert that legal right against the Member State in legal proceedings?

3. Are the provisions of Article 41 of Directive 92/50/EEC in conjunction with Directive 89/665/EEC, which are the basis of an individual's right to have review proceedings conducted, to be interpreted as meaning that a national court with the characteristics of the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten may, when conducting review proceedings on the basis of national provisions such as Paragraph 59 et seq. of the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz and the regulations relating thereto, disregard those provisions if they prevent the carrying out of review proceedings under the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz for the award of service contracts, and therefore nevertheless conduct review proceedings in accordance with Section 8 of the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz?

4. Are the services mentioned in the facts of the case, with reference to Article 10 of Directive 92/50/EEC, to be classified as services coming under Annex I A, Category No 12, of Directive 92/50/EEC (architectural services; engineering services and integrated engineering services; urban planning and landscape architectural services; related scientific and technical consulting services; technical testing and analysis services)?

5. Are the provisions of Directive 92/50/EEC to be interpreted as satisfying the conditions laid down in the judgment in Case 41/74 Van Duyn (paragraph 12) for the direct applicability of a Community directive, with the result that services coming under Annex I A of the directive are to be awarded under the procedure therein mentioned, or are the relevant provisions of the directive in connection with the services mentioned in Annex I A capable of fulfilling the conditions laid down in the said case?'

Admissibility and the first question

11 Before considering the questions, it is necessary to determine whether the UVK is competent to make a reference to the Court of Justice under the preliminary ruling procedure. It should be pointed out in that regard that, in these proceedings, as in the Köllensperger case, (9) both the order for reference and the observations of the parties display some confusion between the conditions which apply in general in relation to the concept of `court or tribunal' in Article 177 and the special conditions laid down in Article 2(8) of the Review Directive. For ease of reference, I would reiterate that the latter conditions concern the composition and operation of the independent body responsible for reviewing, at second instance, the legality of awards of public contracts.

12 That said, I should like to make it clear at the outset that I do not share the doubts - which in fact were expressed only by the defendant in the main proceedings - concerning the competence of the UVK to submit questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling. I am of the opinion that that body fulfils all the requirements, in the light of the case-law, (10) for recognition as a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177. (11)

13 The UVK, which is an independent administrative senate within the meaning of Article 129 of the Austrian constitution, (12) was established by the Carinthian Verwaltungssenatsgesetz. That Law, in conjunction with the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz, confers on the UVK exclusive competence to assess, upon application by a party, the legality of administrative measures, including those relating to the award of public contracts. The UVK has the power to set aside awards and to order interim measures (Article 61 of the Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz). It is apparent from those provisions that the UVK is established by law and that its jurisdiction is compulsory. Moreover, its enduring nature cannot be disputed since it sits permanently, notwithstanding the fact that its members, including those from the administration, remain in office for a limited number of years. Nor is there any doubt that the body in question applies rules of law, since its composition and operation are governed by the Law on independent administrative senates (Carinthian Verwaltungssenatsgesetze) and the Law on the award of public contracts (Carinthian Auftragsvergabegesetz).

The requirement that its procedure must be inter partes, as that criterion is understood by the Court, is also satisfied. (13) The Law on procedure before the administrative courts, (14) which makes observance of the inter partes principle mandatory, is in fact applicable in the present case by virtue of the reference to it in Article 59(2) of the Carinthian Verwaltungssenatsgesetz. Moreover, that conclusion is indirectly confirmed by the Law establishing the UVK, which, in Article 13(5), provides for an oral procedure, under the direction of the President, in which the parties have the right to be heard.

14 Doubts have been expressed, in the course of the written procedure, concerning the conformity of the rules governing the composition and operation of the UVK with the requirement of independence of the judicial body. However, in contrast to my observations in the Köllensperger case, (15) I consider that such doubts are not founded in this case. From an analysis of the applicable rules, it is clear that the UVK has fully independent status which enables it to exercise its judicial function without being subject to undue pressure and interference, especially on the part of the executive.

The UVK's independence and third-party status are guaranteed, first and foremost, by the relevant constitutional provisions. Article 129b(2) of the Bundes-Verfassungsgesetz (B-VG, Federal Constitutional Law) clearly confirms that, in the execution of the tasks entrusted to them by the Constitution itself and by the laws of the Länder, the members of the independent administrative senates may not receive any instructions. The same provision states that cases are to be distributed amongst the members of the Senate in advance for a period fixed by the laws of the Länder. Once a case has been thus assigned to a member of the Senate, it may not then be withdrawn from him except by decision of the President on grounds of serious impediment. Article 129b(3) further provides that, before the expiry of their term of office, the members of the Senate may be removed only in the circumstances expressly provided for by law and that a collective decision of the Senate itself is required for that purpose. Under the next paragraph, the members of the Senate may not engage in any activity which might give rise to doubts as to their independence in the exercise of their functions. It should be added that, by providing that the members of the UVK are to exercise their functions with complete independence and that they are not to be bound by any instructions, Article 5 of the Carinthian Verwaltungssenatsgesetz confirms the guarantees already provided for by the Constitution.

In the light of all those considerations, I am of the opinion that the rules applicable to the UVK fully satisfy the requirements of independence and third-party status which are necessary for proper exercise of the judicial function.

15 Since there are no grounds for doubting the status of the UVK as a court or tribunal, the questions submitted to the Court by that body, which is responsible under the legislation of the Land of Carinthia for reviewing the legality of procedures for the award of public contracts, must be considered admissible.

16 That conclusion also has decisive significance with regard to the answer to be given to the first question. In fact, it supports the view that no useful purpose would be served by the assessment requested by the UVK of whether the rules governing the latter's own composition and operation satisfy the conditions referred to in Article 2(8) of the Review Directive. My reasons for taking that view are the same as those set out in my Opinion in the Köllensperger case: (16) Austrian law entrusts responsibility for review procedures at first and sole instance to a body which is a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177, whereas Article 2(8) as a whole applies exclusively to cases where Member States prefer, as is their right, to adopt a two-tier system of review comprising determination at first instance by a review body which is not a `court or tribunal' and at second instance by a `judicial' body which is independent both of the contracting authority and of the first-instance review body. It is only when a Member State adopts such a `two-tier' system that the second subparagraph of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive applies, and only in that case, therefore, must the conditions relating to the composition and operation of the independent body be observed. It follows that the rules governing the structure and activity of the UVK are not to be assessed in the light of the special conditions set out in Article 2(8) of the Review Directive. (17)

17 I therefore propose that the first question be answered as follows: Article 2(8) of the Review Directive is to be interpreted as meaning that the conditions set out therein concern only the composition and operation of independent bodies responsible for reviewing decisions taken by another body which is competent at first instance to hear review proceedings against the award of public contracts and is not a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty. The provision in question is therefore not relevant as far as the composition and operation of the independent administrative senate of the Land of Carinthia are concerned since the latter is a judicial body which is competent to review, at first and sole instance, measures awarding public contracts.

The second and third questions

18 The second and third questions, which can be examined together, concern the competence of the UVK to hear review proceedings relating to procedures for the award of service contracts even in the absence of specific national provisions implementing Directive 92/50/EEC. I would point out that Article 41 of that directive amended the Review Directive to include within its scope procedures for the award of public service contracts.

19 The Austrian Law implementing the Services Directive entered into force on 1 July 1997, that is, more than two years after the end of the prescribed period. Because of that delay, the award of the contract at issue in the main proceedings took place in conformity with national provisions incompatible with those of the Services Directive. The applicant undertaking in the national proceedings therefore brought review proceedings before the UVK, a body on which, at the material time, domestic law conferred competence to hear only review proceedings concerning awards of supply and works contracts.

20 The national court therefore seeks to ascertain whether, notwithstanding the non-transposition of the directive, an individual is also entitled to use the procedures provided for by Article 2(8) of the Review Directive in relation to the award of a service contract. If the answer is in the affirmative, the court making the reference asks the Court whether such a right may be exercised before a body on which, at the material time, national legislation conferred exclusive competence to hear review proceedings against awards of works and supply contracts.

21 The circumstances of this case display obvious similarities to those of the Dorsch Consult case, cited above, and the Tögel case. (18) In particular, the second and third questions submitted to the Court by the UVK are completely identical to the first and second questions submitted by the Bundesvergabeamt in the Tögel case.

22 In those judgments, the Court reached conclusions to which I can subscribe. It held that `it does not follow from Article 41 of Directive 92/50 that, where that directive has not been transposed by the end of the period laid down for that purpose, the appeal bodies of the Member States having competence in relation to procedures for the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts may also hear appeals relating to procedures for the award of public service contracts'; (19) that is so because, in principle, it is for the legal system of each Member State to determine which court or tribunal has jurisdiction to hear disputes involving individual rights derived from Community law. (20)

Starting from those premisses, the Court held that, although Article 41 of the Services Directive requires the Member States to adopt the measures necessary to ensure effective review in the field of public service contracts, it does not indicate which national bodies are to be the competent bodies for this purpose or whether those bodies are to be the same as those which the Member States have designated in the field of public works contracts and public supply contracts. (21)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

The Court added, however, that it is for the national court, in compliance with the requirement that domestic law must be interpreted in conformity with the Services Directive and the requirement that the fullest possible protection of the rights of individuals must be ensured, to determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring review proceedings in relation to awards of public service contracts. The substantive provisions of the Services Directive could then, in so far as they are capable of direct effect, (22) be relied on in proceedings against a State which had failed to transpose it. The national court must determine whether such a right of appeal may be exercised before the same bodies as those which are competent to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts. (23) I would, however, add that in this case it is questionable whether a similar conclusion can be reached: as has been observed previously, the text of the Austrian law, which has been in force since 1 July 1997, expressly excludes application of the Services Directive to proceedings which are already pending.

The Court went on to state that, if the relevant domestic provisions cannot be interpreted in conformity with the Services Directive, the persons concerned, using the appropriate domestic law procedures, may claim compensation for the damage incurred owing to the failure to transpose the directive within the time prescribed. (24)

23 The conclusion reached by the Court in the cases cited is entirely appropriate to the circumstances of this case, in which the issue is precisely whether the body responsible under Austrian legislation for determining review proceedings concerning the award of public supply and public works contracts is also competent to hear review proceedings in relation to services. I therefore propose that the second and third questions referred by the UVK be answered as follows: neither Article 2(8) nor other provisions of Directive 89/665/EEC are to be interpreted as meaning that, in the absence of national measures to implement the directive within the period laid down for that purpose, the review bodies of the Member States which are competent in relation to procedures for the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts are also entitled to review procedures for the award of public service contracts. However, the requirement that domestic law must be interpreted in conformity with Directive 92/50/EEC and the requirement that the rights of individuals must be protected effectively mean that the national court must determine whether the relevant provisions of domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring review proceedings in relation to the award of public service contracts.

The fourth and fifth questions

24 The fourth and fifth questions concern the interpretation of certain provisions of the Review Directive. By its fourth question, the referring court seeks to ascertain whether the service which was the subject of the contract notice published by the Landeskrankenanstalten-Betriebsgesellschaft falls within Category No 12 of Annex I A to the Services Directive. If so, the implication of such a classification would be that the contract should have been awarded in conformity with the procedures referred to in Titles III, IV, V and VI of the Services Directive.

It will be recalled that Category No 12 covers the following: architectural services; engineering services and integrated engineering; urban planning and landscape architectural services; related scientific and technical consulting services; technical testing and analysis services. That category corresponds to Reference No 867 of the common product classification (CPC) nomenclature of the United Nations.

25 I share the view expressed by all the parties to the proceedings that the services at issue in the main proceedings are to be regarded as `engineering services' of the kind referred to in Category No 12. In fact, the notice of the contract with which the main proceedings are concerned referred to planning and processing works, to be entrusted to firms of consulting engineers, in connection with the construction of a children's hospital at the Landeskrankenhaus Klagenfurt, with the corresponding outpatient facilities, operating theatre and X-ray laboratory as well as five children's wards and a children's surgical ward; it also included planning services for the sanitary, heating and ventilation installations with air conditioning and high- and low-voltage installations, `structural and constructional engineering' services and planning services for the medical installations. All those services can clearly be regarded as `engineering services' and `related scientific and technical consulting services' as referred to in Category No 12. They therefore come fully within the scope of the Services Directive, so that the contracts for those services must be awarded in conformity with the provisions of Titles III to VI of the Services Directive.

26 Finally, by its fifth question, the UVK asks the Court to rule on the direct applicability of the provisions of the Services Directive. Although in the text of the question the UVK refers to the directive generally, in the grounds of the order for reference it expressly refers only to Articles 1 to 7.

27 As the Court has consistently held, (25) for individuals to be able to rely, in proceedings against the State, on provisions of a directive which has not been transposed, or correctly transposed, into national law, those provisions must as far as their subject-matter is concerned be unconditional and sufficiently clear and precise.

28 The fifth question corresponds to the second part of the third question referred to the Court in the Tögel case. In the judgment in that case, the Court held that the provisions of the Services Directive may be relied on directly by individuals before national courts. (26) I see no reason to dispute that conclusion, which is based on an analysis of the wording of the directive. Although the provisions of Title I, relating to the persons and matters covered by the directive (Articles 1 to 7), are not inherently capable of creating rights for individuals, they are nevertheless essential for the purpose of identifying the persons enjoying rights and having obligations under the directive, so that, in combination with the substantive provisions, they may be relied on directly before a court.

As regards the provisions of Title II (Articles 8 to 10), concerning the procedures applicable to the services listed in Annexes I A and I B, they require contracting authorities to comply with the procedures referred to in Titles III to VI so far as the services listed in Annexe I A are concerned, and with those referred to in Articles 14 to 16 so far as the services listed in Annex I B are concerned. Those rules are not made subject to any conditions and are sufficiently clear and precise to create rights for individuals which may be relied on before a court.

The same conclusion applies, in principle, to the provisions contained in the subsequent titles. Those provisions relate to the `choice of award procedures and rules governing design contests' (Title III), the `common rules in the technical field' (Title IV), the `common advertising rules' (Title V) and the `common rules on participation' (Title VI). They specify in detail the obligations imposed on contracting authorities in the preparation and conduct of invitations to tender. Observance of the rules set out therein may therefore be called for directly by an individual before the competent courts. (27)

It should, however, be added that, in its judgment in the Tögel case, the Court, in adopting the view taken by the Advocate General, held that the part of the directive under consideration here contains provisions - not specified - which are not clear, precise and unconditional and may therefore not be relied on directly before a court. (28) The conclusion that the provisions of the abovementioned titles, which by their wording are not clear, precise and unconditional, are not capable of direct effect was supported by the circumstance that a comprehensive analysis of all the provisions of the titles in question was not warranted by the specific facts of the case. Consideration of whether particular provisions of those titles are capable of direct effect must await a reference for a preliminary ruling in which such an examination is specifically required. (29)

Such a conclusion is all the more justifiable in the present case. Firstly, the facts of the case do not require specific interpretations of all the provisions contained in the abovementioned titles of the directive (twenty-seven articles in all). Secondly, it can be deduced from the grounds of the order for reference, although it gives very little information, that the interest of the court appears limited to the articles contained in the first part of the directive. For those reasons, even though I have doubts as to whether it is actually necessary to give an answer to the fifth question in view of its lack of precision with regard to Titles III to VI of the Services Directive, I propose that the Court give the same answer as it gave in the Tögel judgment.

29 In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the Court answer the questions submitted by the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten for a preliminary ruling as follows:

(1) Article 2(8) of the Review Directive is to be interpreted as meaning that the conditions contained therein concern exclusively the composition and operation of independent bodies responsible for reviewing decisions taken by another body which is competent, at first instance, to hear review proceedings against the award of public contracts and which is not a court or tribunal as referred to in Article 177 of the Treaty. The provision in question is therefore not relevant for the purpose of assessing the composition and operation of the independent administrative senate of the Land of Carinthia, since the latter is a judicial body which is competent, at first and sole instance, to review measures awarding public contracts.

(2) Neither Article 2(8) nor any other provision of Directive 89/665/EEC is to be interpreted as meaning that, in the absence of national implementing measures adopted within the period laid down for that purpose, the review bodies of the Member States having competence in relation to procedures for the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts may also hear review proceedings relating to the award of public service contracts. However, in order to fulfil the requirement that domestic law must be interpreted in conformity with Directive 92/50/EEC and the requirement that the rights of individuals must be protected effectively, the national court must determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring review proceedings in relation to the award of public service contracts.

(3) The services covered by the contract notice published by the Landeskrankenanstalten-Betriebsgesellschaft for the construction project relating to the Klagenfurt hospital are engineering services falling within Category No 12 of Annex I A to the Services Directive. Consequently, a contract concerned with such services must be awarded in conformity with the procedures referred to in Titles III, IV, V and VI of that directive.

(4) The provisions of Titles I and II of the Services Directive are unconditional and sufficiently clear and precise to be relied on directly before national courts. As regards the provisions of Titles III, IV, V and VI, they may be relied on by an individual before a national court to the extent to which it is clear from an individual examination of them that they are unconditional and sufficiently clear and precise.

(11) - In the light of the Court's case-law, it is necessary to take account of many different factors and specifically of whether the body is established by law, whether it is permanent, whether its jurisdiction is compulsory, whether its procedure is inter partes, whether it applies rules of law and whether it is impartial and independent.

(12) - Under that provision, the independent administrative senates of the Länder and the Administrative Court, Vienna, are responsible for ensuring the legality of administrative acts. The following provision, Article 129a(1), lists the various powers of the senates, which are to be exercised after the administrative remedies have been exhausted. They include jurisdiction to determine appeals by private individuals claiming that their rights have been infringed by the exercise of administrative power of command and coercion (paragraph 1), and jurisdiction to determine all other matters assigned to them under the Federal or Land laws governing the individual spheres of administration (paragraph 3).

(13) - Having first stated that `the requirement that the procedure ... must be inter partes is not an absolute criterion', the Court held, in paragraph 31 of the Dorsch Consult judgment, that it is sufficient that the parties to the procedure before the procurement review body must be heard before any determination is made by the chamber concerned.

(28) - Judgment in Tögel, at paragraph 46, and Opinion of Advocate General Fennelly, at point 57. Article 21 of the directive can be cited as an example. It confers on contracting authorities the right to arrange for the publication in the Official Journal of the European Communities of notices announcing public service contracts which are not subject to the publication requirement referred to in Article 15 et seq. of the Services Directive. Such a provision is clearly not capable of having direct effect since it cannot, by its very nature, be relied on directly before a court by an individual.

Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations - Freedom to provide services - Public procurement procedures - Water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors.
Case C-225/97.

1 In the present case, the Commission is seeking a declaration that the French Republic has only partly - and, in any event, incorrectly - transposed into national law Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (hereinafter `the Directive'). (1)

The Directive

2 The Directive is designed to ensure that swift and effective review procedures are available at national law so that infringements of the Community public procurement rules can be prevented or remedied (2) and specifies the `powers' to be conferred on review bodies. Article 2(1) allows Member States to choose between two - different but equivalent in terms of their practical effect - courses of action: (3) first, the `suspension-annulment' option provided for in Article 2(1)(a) and (b); alternatively, the adoption (with maximum care) of other measures designed to attain the same result, such as `making an order for the payment of a particular sum, in cases where the infringement has not been corrected or prevented'. (4) The French legislature chose the latter option, envisaged by Article 2(1)(c), when transposing the Directive into national law.

3 Chapter II of the Directive governs the attestation system which is also relevant to the present case. Essentially, the Member States are to give contracting entities the possibility of `having recourse to an attestation system', (5) the salient features of which are described in Articles 4 to 7. This system permits the entities in question to `have their contract award procedures and practices which fall within the scope of Directive 90/531/EEC examined periodically with a view to obtaining an attestation that, at that time, those procedures and practices are in conformity with Community law concerning the award of contracts and the national rules implementing the law'. (6)

4 Chapter IV of the Directive introduces a conciliation system, available upon request. Pursuant to Article 9, application of this procedure may be requested by `any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular contract falling within the scope of Directive 90/531/EEC and who, in relation to the procedure for the award of that contract, considers that he has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement of Community law in the field of procurement or national rules implementing that law'. (7) The task of the conciliators - provided, of course, that the contracting entity consents to initiation of the procedure in question - is to endeavour `as quickly as possible to reach an agreement between the parties which is in accordance with Community law' (8) and to report to the Commission `on their findings and on any result achieved'. (9)

5 The deadline set by the Directive for its implementation expired on 1 January 1993.

The French implementing legislation

6 The Directive was transposed into French law by Law No 93-1416 of 29 December 1993 on review procedures relating to the award of certain supply and works contracts in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors. (10) A copy of that Law was notified to the Commission under cover of a letter of 14 January 1994.

In order to implement Article 2 of the Directive, the French legislature chose the option provided for in Article 2(1)(c), under which the courts may be empowered `[to make] an order for the payment of a particular sum, in cases where the infringement has not been corrected or prevented'. (11)

To that end, Article 1 of Law No 93-1416 provides that on application by any person with an interest in concluding the contract and likely to be harmed by non-compliance on the part of the contracting entity, the President of the appropriate court may order the defaulting party to comply with its obligations and may prescribe the period within which it must do so. Where non-compliance persists, he may also order a periodic penalty payment (astreinte provisoire) to be made as from the expiry of the period prescribed. However, he may `take into account the probable consequences of such a measure for all interests likely to be harmed, as well as the public interest, and may decide not to order such a measure where its negative consequences could exceed its benefits'. (12) The fourth paragraph of Article 1 provides that `in setting the amount of the periodic penalty payment, regard shall be had to the conduct of the party against which the order has been made and to the difficulties which it has encountered in order to comply therewith'.

Subsequently, provision is made in the sixth paragraph of Article 1 for payment of a fixed sum by way of penalty (astreinte définitive): `if, on settlement of the periodic penalty payment, the infringement in question has not been corrected, the court may order payment of a fixed sum'.

The penalty payment, whether periodic or fixed, is wholly distinct from damages and orders to make such payments may be cancelled, wholly or in part, if it is established that the default or delay in implementing the court's order has been caused, wholly or in part, by external factors. (13)

Article 4 of Law No 93-1416 confers similar powers on the President of an administrative court.

7 The French legislation in issue contains no provision specifically intended to implement Chapters II and III of the Directive, which concern, respectively, the attestation system and the conciliation procedure.

The pre-litigation procedure

8 By formal letter of notice of 8 September 1995, the Commission informed the French authorities that the penalty payment system introduced by Law No 93-1416 did not constitute a correct transposition of Chapter I of the Directive into national law. It also pointed out that the Law in question makes no provision for the implementation of the attestation system or the conciliation procedure envisaged by the Directive.

Not satisfied with the French authorities' reply, the Commission delivered a reasoned opinion to the French Government on 8 November 1996.

However, not even the reply to the reasoned opinion was found to be satisfactory and the Commission therefore brought the present proceedings under Article 169 of the Treaty.

Substance

9 The Commission put forward a number of grounds in support of its position that the Directive had not been correctly transposed into French national law: (i) the penalty payment system introduced by Law No 93-1416 did not correctly implement Article 2 of the Directive; (ii) the French legislature had made no attempt to implement the provisions of the Directive concerning the attestation system and the conciliation procedure.

The penalty payment system

10 With a view to transposing the Directive into national law, France chose option (c), that is to say, the `financial deterrent' approach, rather than the suspension-annulment option. (14) Law No 93-1416 confers on the President of the competent judicial body power to order the defaulting party to comply. At the same time, he may impose penalty payments - initially in the form of a payment per diem, but which can later be converted to a fixed amount. (15)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

11 The Commission does not in principle take issue with the French authorities' choice of option (c), but it maintains that Law No 93-1416 has not given full effect to the relevant provisions of the Directive. The penalty payment system introduced by the French legislature is not a sufficient deterrent as expressly required by Article 2(5) of the Directive. To be more exact, the Commission argues that Article 2(5) must be given full effect by a specific provision of national law, whereas under the French legislation the fixing of penalties at a level guaranteed to deter lies entirely within the discretion of the courts. In the Commission's view, it is no defence to argue that the national courts are required nevertheless to interpret national law in the light of the aims of the Directive, hence to set the penalty payment at a level sufficiently high to ensure that it acts as a deterrent. On that point, the Commission refers to the case-law of the Court to the effect that the fact that the national courts can be presumed consistently to adopt an approach consonant with the spirit and wording of a directive is not enough to meet the requirements entailed by correct transposition into national law. (16)

What, according to the Commission, would have been the proper course of action? The Commission maintains that the special deterrent character of the penalty payment system should have been guaranteed directly by the legislature. That is to say, the amounts should have been fixed by statute rather than left to the discretion of the courts. In any event, the implementing legislation should have expressly stated that penalty payments must be fixed at a level high enough to have the necessary deterrent effect, or it should have laid down rules limiting the discretion of the courts in that regard, by prescribing a minimum amount or other suitable parameters.

12 In response, the French Government contends essentially that the penalty payment constitutes by definition an adequate deterrent. Moreover, nowhere in the Directive is there provision for minimum levels to be set for amounts payable under Article 2(1)(c); nor, a fortiori, for such levels to be set by statute. That approach was indeed suggested by the Commission in its proposal for a directive, but was not incorporated in the text finally adopted. (17)

13 The Commission's argument leaves me somewhat confused. Above all, I am not convinced by the theory that the French legislature should have specified that the penalty payment should act as a deterrent. To my mind, that would have been wholly gratuitous. By its very nature, the penalty payment is designed precisely to undermine resistance on the part of the defaulting party, quite simply because he is thereby compelled to pay a certain sum of money for every single day of delay in complying. The penalty payment is therefore a typical means of enforcing court orders; its deterrent effect stems from its particular mode of operation. That is why an express legislative provision baldly stating that the penalty payment must act as a deterrent does absolutely nothing to enhance the dissuasive character which already distinguishes that mechanism, being as it is a means - and a particularly effective one at that - of enforcing compliance with court rulings.

14 An altogether separate matter, and a more delicate one, is the question whether the French legislature should have made certain of the deterrent effect by specifying the relevant amounts in the implementing legislation, or by laying down specific criteria or other rules on the basis of which the amounts should be calculated so as to limit the discretion of the courts on that point. That, in my view, is the main thrust of the Commission's complaint. Article 2(5) provides, in fact, that `[t]he sum to be paid in accordance with paragraph 1(c) must be set at a level high enough to dissuade the contracting entity from committing or persisting in an infringement'. (18) The difficulty, however, lies in determining by whom the amount is to `be set': by the courts in the exercise of their discretion, as the French Government maintains; or indirectly by statute, through the setting of parameters within which the courts may do this.

To my mind, the correct approach is the former, which was adopted by the French legislature. The contrary view, sustained by the Commission, finds no support in the wording of the Directive:

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

Article 2(5) does not specify that the legislature, rather than the courts, must fix the amount of the penalties payable. Moreover, the Commission acknowledges that this is not a requirement imposed directly by the Directive. On the contrary, the initial proposal made specific provision to that effect, but that formed no part of the text adopted. Admittedly, that is not in itself conclusive. It seems to me, however, that upon a proper construction of the Directive the only absolute obligation incumbent on Member States is to make the system effective; that is to say, to introduce a mechanism which enables infringements to be remedied and which also has a deterrent effect vis-à-vis future infringements. In other words, in order to give proper effect to the option provided for by the Directive at (c), the Member States must introduce a measure whereby, as a manner of speaking, a `financial deterrent' is brought to bear, powerful enough to be effective in terms of attaining the objectives referred to above.

If that is indeed the position, the French legislature has correctly implemented Article 2 of the Directive through recourse to the penalty payment mechanism, which plays a special role in French law as one of the most efficient traditional methods of securing compliance with judicial rulings. (19) Moreover, I do not accept that the dissuasive force of penalty payments - which the Commission, rightly, insists on - necessarily depends on the amount being fixed by statute in the legislation implementing the Directive. (20) On the contrary, I think that assumption is belied by the experience of those legal systems in which recourse to the penalty payment system is common: there is no doubt as to its deterrent effect, even though in many cases determination of the amount is a matter for the courts, at their discretion, rather than for the legislature. (21)

15 Certainly, the correct operation of `option (c)' - and, particularly, the true deterrent effect of the penalty payments - depends on the prudent exercise of discretion by the courts called upon to set the amount payable. However, in my view, if the material provisions of this directive are to be correctly implemented, the courts must be allowed to apply them with an appropriate measure of discretion. Infringements may take various forms. The conduct of contracting entities, too, may vary - according to whether or not they act in good faith, whether they are concerned to remedy infringements or to prevent them, and so on. It seems clear that such factors must be borne in mind when it comes to setting a figure to be paid under Article 2(1)(c) and there can be no body better placed to make such appraisals than the courts in the exercise of their discretion. Statutory determination of the amounts is a very blunt instrument to wield in this context. Admittedly, legislation under which the courts were able to set the figure between a minimum and a maximum amount would satisfy the requirement that penalty payments be set at an amount appropriate to the individual case. However, that approach would in no way displace the discretion of the courts when it came to quantifying the amounts in practice, albeit within the parameters set by statute. On the other hand, such parameters would have to be sufficiently wide to enable the courts to take into account the various situations which may arise. Moreover, it would not be appropriate for this Court to monitor the national legislature's exercise of discretion in fixing such thresholds when implementing the Directive.

It is significant, on the other hand, that the Directive itself conferred on review bodies a broad discretion in the exercise of their powers under Article 2. Under Article 2(4), `[t]he Member States may provide that, when considering whether to order interim measures, the body responsible may take into account the probable consequences of the measures for all interests likely to be harmed, as well as the public interest, and may decide not to grant such measures where their negative consequences could exceed their benefits....' (22) That provision would be wholly frustrated if Member States were required to adopt a system under which the competent national bodies could do no more than mechanically apply the remedies prescribed by statute.

16 The Commission argues, however, that Law No 93-1416 - in so far as it provides that the courts, in the exercise of their discretion, are to set the amount of the penalty payments, unshackled by any statutory provision in that regard - in effect delegates to the courts responsibility for the correct implementation of the Directive. The Commission maintains, therefore, that, according to the case-law of the Court, even if it is assumed that the French courts make proper use of their discretion and construe the provisions of national law in a manner consistent with the aims of the Directive, the requirements entailed by correct transposition of the Directive into national law are not satisfied. It cites on that point the Opinion of Advocate General Léger in Commission v Greece: (23) `[n]ational case-law interpreting provisions of domestic law in a manner regarded as being in conformity with the requirements of a directive is not sufficient to make those provisions into measures transposing the directive in question'.

There are two points to be made here. In the first place, the courts - in common with all other State bodies - are required to construe provisions of national law in the light of the aims of a directive. (24) Thus, the French courts are also addressees of the Directive in issue. Arguably, indeed, Article 2(5) - in so far as it lays down that the amount payable must be fixed at a level sufficient to ensure that it acts as an effective deterrent - is directed primarily at the national courts, since it also specifies the nature of the powers to be conferred on them.

Secondly, I do not think that the precedent relied upon by the Commission is relevant here. In Commission v Greece, no implementing measure existed, and by way of defence the Greek Government merely contended that the case-law of the Council of State already afforded `sufficient judicial protection to meet the requirements of the directive'. (25) Quite properly, therefore, the Advocate General and the Court decided in that case that the situation did not meet the fundamental requirements demanded of implementing measures, namely, `those of legal certainty and adequate publicity'. (26) The present case, however, is different. The Directive was transposed into national law by means of a specific legislative instrument and the French authorities can scarcely be criticised for not incorporating therein a provision that is neither required by the Directive nor essential for the attainment of its aims. As regards the requirements of legal certainty, to my mind these are fully satisfied - as the Court has consistently held (27) - as soon as individuals are in a position to ascertain the existence and scope of their rights under the Directive. In the present case, this means that that fundamental requirement is satisfied if the undertakings concerned are in a position to realise that remedies are available in respect of failure to comply with the Community rules on public procurement, and if the courts are able to make penalty payment orders in cases where the contracting entity fails to comply with court rulings. Prior knowledge of the level of penalty payments is not required under the Directive; nor, when considered more closely, would it satisfy any of the requirements of legal certainty. Such knowledge would in any event be merely indicative and incomplete since determination of the amount - for the reasons set out above - depends on a number of factors which are not predictable.

17 A further ground of complaint raised by the Commission against Law No 93-1416 is that the penalty payment system provided for derogates from the rules which ordinarily govern penalty payments in French law, particularly with respect to the Law of 1991 on the reform of civil enforcement procedures. (28) Thus the French authorities have infringed Article 1(2) of the Directive, which provides that `Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings likely to make a claim for injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules'.

However, this ground of complaint should be dismissed, too. As the French Government correctly pointed out, the area governed by Law No 93-1416 falls outside the scope of Law No 91-650. The latter concerns the performance of obligations which have already been defined and enables the courts, inter alia, to make penalty payment orders. Accordingly, Law No 91-650 could not be appropriated sic et simpliciter as the basis for transposing the Directive into French law. It does not enable either the ordinary courts or the administrative courts to intervene in public procurement procedures. Accordingly, the adoption of Law No 93-1416 cannot be said to indicate an intention on the part of the French legislature to set up a special and less coercive procedure distinct from the rules of civil law in force. The only feature shared by the two bodies of rules is that they both provide for recourse to the penalty payment system. Otherwise, they are wholly dissimilar. Consequently, I fail to detect any infringement of Article 1(2) since, given the inapplicability of the rules laid down in Law No 91-650, the national legislature laid down special implementing rules to accommodate the particular needs which arise in disputes governed by the Directive in question.

18 Lastly, the Commission's final complaint against Law No 93-1416 remains to be examined. This concerns the distinction between periodic penalty payment orders and fixed penalty payment orders. Specifically, the Commission maintains that it is incompatible with the Directive to allow - as does Law No 93-1416 - the courts first to make a periodic penalty payment order and then, when a definitive figure is arrived at, a fixed penalty payment order. That, according to the Commission, is neither provided for nor permitted under the Directive: the Community legislature merely provided that the payment `may be made to depend upon a final decision that the infringement has in fact taken place'. (29) Secondly, by contrast with Law No 93-1416, nowhere in the Directive is power conferred on the courts to adjust the amount payable or, in determining the amount, to take into account the conduct of the party against whom the order is made. According to the Commission, this weakens the deterrent effect of the French system.

I cannot agree. Admittedly, the Directive does not expressly draw any distinction between periodic and fixed penalty payment orders; on the other hand, neither does it expressly preclude such a distinction. The only test that can be applied in order to ascertain whether the implementing legislation correctly transposes the Directive into national law is whether or not the mechanism introduced is effective. It does not seem to me that the interplay between periodic and fixed penalty payment orders impairs its deterrent effect. Rather, to my mind, the reverse is true. (30) Indeed, the fact that, when the amount has been set, the court makes a fixed penalty payment order, taking into account the conduct of the defaulting contracting entity, means that the latter remains sub judice, so to speak. Where non-compliance persists, the conduct of the defaulting party may lead the court to increase the amount initially decided upon when the level of the periodic penalty payment was fixed. As for the possibility that, when quantifying the fixed penalty payment, the court may reduce the amount in order to take account of the defaulting party's conduct, it seems to me that that represents a proper application of the principle of proportionality. (31) It would be contrary to that fundamental principle if the courts were compelled to determine definitively the amount payable by the contracting entity without being able to take into consideration its willingness to comply, its attempts to remedy the infringement, or any other particular features characterising the individual case.

The attestation system

19 The Commission alleges that France failed to adopt any measure implementing Chapter II of the Directive concerning the attestation system. The French Government, for its part, acknowledges that Law No 93-1416 does not contain any specific provisions on that subject, but maintains that these were not necessary in the circumstances. Proper effect is given to Chapter II of the Directive simply if contracting entities are made aware that they may submit their procurement procedures for attestation in accordance with its provisions. This the French authorities achieved by publishing Directive 92/13/EEC in a review which specialises in the public procurement sector and which has a particularly wide circulation. (32) So far no attestator has been designated, for the simple reason that no contracting entity has as yet requested attestation.

To my mind, the Commission's complaint in this respect must be upheld. As the Commission points out, the provisions of Chapter II of the Directive require adoption of specific provisions in the implementing legislation designed to set out in detail the attestation system decided upon, the rules governing the designation of attestators, the professional qualifications required, and so on. There is no such provision in Law No 93-1416. Furthermore, according to established case-law, the provisions of a directive must be implemented `with unquestionable binding force, [and] with the specificity, precision and clarity required... to satisfy the requirement of legal certainty'. (33) Consequently, `in order to secure the full implementation of directives in law and not only in fact, Member States must establish a specific legal framework in the area in question'. (34) The mere act of publishing the Directive in a review, albeit a review with a particularly wide circulation in the public procurement sector, is not enough to satisfy the stringent requirements laid down by that case-law.

The conciliation procedure

20 Lastly, the Commission maintains that the French authorities failed to transpose into national law the provisions of Chapter IV of the Directive concerning the conciliation procedure. The French Government does not contest this, but contends that, in the present case, there was no need for any express implementing provision. Under the Directive, Member States are obliged solely to notify to the Commission requests for conciliation from interested parties; (35) moreover, the latter are sufficiently aware that recourse to such a procedure is possible under the Directive, thanks to its publication in Marchés Publics, the review mentioned above.

To my mind, the defence offered by the French Government is untenable. Indeed, the restricted role assigned to Member States under Chapter IV of the Directive in the context of conciliation procedures does not relieve the national authorities of their obligation to adopt measures designed to ensure that those provisions are implemented - all the more since, as the French Government acknowledges, their transposition into national law is intended to enable interested parties to learn of the existence of such a procedure, as well as the fact that they may have recourse to it. This fundamental requirement of publicity - for reasons similar to those cited in connection with the attestation system - cannot be considered satisfied by mere publication of the Directive in the edition of Marchés Publics referred to, which does not quite meet the requirements laid down by the case-law of the Court.

Conclusion

21 In the light of the above considerations, I propose that the Court:

(1) declare that, by failing to adopt within the period prescribed the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with Chapters II and IV of Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under that Directive;

(2) order the French Republic to pay the costs.

(2) - See the fifth recital in the preamble thereto. Article 1 provides: `1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that decisions taken by contracting entities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(8), on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of procurement or national rules implementing that law as regards: (a) contract award procedures falling within the scope of Council Directive

90/531/EEC; and (b) compliance with Article 3(2)(a) of that Directive in the case of the contracting entities to which that provision applies....'

(3) - The so-called `suspension-annulment' option is provided for in Article 2 as follows:

`The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers:

either

(a) to take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedure, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further injury to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting entity;

and

(b) to set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the notice of contract, the periodic indicative notice, the notice on the existence of a system of qualification, the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure in question;

(20) - Of course, there are many cases where the legislature has laid down detailed rules for determining the amount of the astreinte. For example, Article 16 of Council Regulation No 17/62/EEC of 6 February 1962: First Regulation implementing Articles 85 and 86 of the Treaty (English Special Edition, 1959-62 I, p. 87) confers on the Commission power to impose `periodic penalty payments of from 50 to 1000 units of account per day [of delay]'; in Council Regulation (EEC) No 4064/89 of 21 December 1989 on the control of concentrations between undertakings (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 1), the method adopted by the Community legislature was to fix a ceiling for the periodic penalty payment (Article 15). This does not mean, however, that the astreinte is effective only when the legislature has fixed minimum and/or maximum amounts.

(21) - See, on the subject of the rules introduced into Belgian law by the uniform Benelux legislation on the astreinte (Agreement signed on 26 November 1973, Tractatenblad, 1974, 6), the comments of J. van Compernolle, L'Astreinte, Brussels, 1992, p. 47. With regard to the determination of amounts, the author points out that `the courts enjoy the broadest possible discretion as regards determination of the amount. ... Taking into account all the circumstances of the case, including the conduct of the defaulting party and his financial position, the courts are free to fix the amount considered sufficient to compel the defaulting party to comply with the main order. ... In this area, the power of assessment of the courts is absolute' (my emphasis).

That also makes it necessary to determine definitively the amount payable'.

(31) - In my view, it is no accident that Article 15(3) of the Regulation on the control of concentrations, cited in footnote 20, provides that `Where the persons referred to in Article 3(1)(b), undertakings or associations of undertakings have satisfied the obligation which it was the purpose of the periodic penalty payment to enforce, the Commission may set the total amount of the periodic penalty payments at a lower figure than that which would arise under the original decision' (my emphasis). Nor does it seem to me that that provision, which is entirely consonant with the principle of proportionality, diminishes the deterrent effect of the penalty payment.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Fennelly delivered on 2 April 1998.
EvoBus Austria GmbH v Niederösterreichische Verkehrsorganisations GmbH (Növog).
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public procurement in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors - Effect of a directive which has not been transposed.
Case C-111/97.

I - Introduction

1 This case relates to the award of a contract for the supply of buses for a regular inter-urban express bus service in Austria. It raises, in particular, questions regarding the bodies competent to review such contracts, the availability of remedies and the application of national time-limits for bringing proceedings where the relevant Community directive has not been implemented in time.

II - Legal and factual context

A - Community law

2 Article 1 of Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (1) (hereinafter referred to as `the Utilities Review Directive'), as amended, provides as follows:

`(1) The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that decisions taken by contracting entities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(8), on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of (2) procurement or national rules implementing that law as regards:

(a) contract award procedures falling within the scope of Council Directive 93/38/EEC; (3) and

(b) compliance with Article 3(2)(a) of that Directive in the case of the contracting entities to which that provision applies.

(2) Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings likely to make a claim for injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.

(3) The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting entity of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

Article 2 of the Utilities Review Directive provides, in relevant part, as follows:

`(1) The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers:

either

(a) to take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedure, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement of preventing further injury to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting entity; and

(b) to set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the notice of contract, the periodic indicative notice, the notice on the existence of a system of qualification, the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure in question; or

(c) to take, at the earliest opportunity, if possible by way of interlocutory procedures and if necessary by a final procedure on the substance, measures other than those provided for in points (a) and (b) with the aim of correcting any identified infringement and preventing injury to the interests concerned; in particular, making an order for the payment of a particular sum, in cases where the infringement has not been corrected or prevented.

Member States may take this choice either for all contracting entities or for categories of entities defined on the basis of objective criteria, in any event preserving the effectiveness of the measures laid down in order to prevent injury being caused to the interests concerned;

(d) and, in both of the above cases, to award damages to persons injured by the infringement.

Where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision has been taken unlawfully, Member States may, where their system of internal law so requires and provides bodies having the necessary powers for that purpose, provide that the contested decision must first be set aside or declared illegal.

(2) The powers referred to in paragraph 1 may be conferred on separate bodies responsible for different aspects of the review procedure.

(8) The Member States shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

(9) Where (4) bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty and independent of both the contracting entity and the review body.

The members of the independent body referred to in the first paragraph shall be appointed and leave office under the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office, and their removal. At least the President of this independent body shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. The independent body shall take its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard, and these decisions shall, by means determined by each Member State, be legally binding.'

3 Article 2 of Council Directive 93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (5) (hereinafter `the Utilities Directive') provides, in relevant part, as follows:

`(1) This Directive shall apply to contracting entities which:

(a) are public authorities or public undertakings and exercise one of the activities referred to in paragraph 2;

(b) when they are not public authorities or public undertakings, have as one of their activities any of those referred to in paragraph 2 or any combination thereof and operate on the basis of special or exclusive rights granted by a competent authority of a Member State.

(2) Relevant activities for the purposes of this Directive shall be:

(c) the operation of networks providing a service to the public in the field of transport by railway, automated systems, tramway, trolley bus, bus or cable.

As regards transport services, a network shall be considered to exist where the service is provided under operating conditions laid down by a competent authority of a Member State, such as conditions on the routes to be served, the capacity to be made available or the frequency of the service; ....'

B - Implementation in national law

4 By virtue of Article 65 of and Annex XVI to the Agreement on the European Economic Area signed at Oporto on 2 May 1992, the Republic of Austria was obliged to transpose into national law, by 1 January 1994 at the latest, (6) a number of Community acts in the field of public procurement, including Council Directive 90/531/EEC (7) and Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (8) (hereinafter `the Review Directive'). These directives were transposed at federal level by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen or Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law, hereinafter `the BVergG'), (9) which entered into force on 1 January 1994. Part 4 of the BVergG, on legal protection (Rechtsschutz), establishes a review procedure before the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office). Paragraph 92(3) provides that proceedings against the award of a contract must be introduced by an aggrieved tenderer before the Bundesvergabeamt within two weeks of his being informed of the award. The second sentence of Paragraph 7(2) of the BVergG expressly excluded the application of the provisions of Part 4 to the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors.

5 By virtue of Article 168 of the Act concerning the conditions of accession of the Kingdom of Norway, the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden and the adjustments to the Treaties on which the European Union is founded, of 24 June 1994, (10) the Utilities Directive and the Utilities Review Directive were required to be transposed into Austrian law by the date of accession, viz. 1 January 1995. (11) Transposition of the Utilities Review Directive at federal level took place by means of an amendment of the BVergG by a law of 30 December 1996, (12) which extended the review competence of the Bundesvergabeamt to awards of public contracts for the utilities in question and which entered into force on 1 January 1997, without altering the rules applicable to proceedings already commenced before the Bundesvergabeamt.

C - Facts and proceedings

6 The Niederösterreichische Verkehrsorganisations Gesellschaft m.b.H. (hereinafter `NOVOG') is a body governed by private law. It operates bus routes on the basis of a licence granted by the Amt der Niederösterreichischen Landesregierung (Office of the Provincial Government of Lower Austria). It enjoys, according to the Bundesvergabeamt, special rights, thus bringing it within the scope of the Utilities Directive. (13) Since NOVOG operates a network for the provision of public bus transport services, the Bundesvergabeamt deems it to be a contracting entity. (14)

7 By a letter of 26 April 1996 to the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities, NOVOG solicited, by way of open invitation, tenders for the supply of 36 to 46 buses for the regular inter-urban express bus service in the Bundesland Niederösterreich (Federal Province of Lower Austria). The opening of the tenders took place on 27 June 1995. Unsuccessful tenderers were informed to that effect by registered letter recorded as having been sent on 16 November 1995. EvoBus Austria GmbH (hereinafter `EvoBus') applied to the Bundesvergabeamt on 19 July 1996 for a review of the contract award procedure to be conducted. EvoBus complained of a subsequent amendment of the successful tender, through the alteration of the repurchase price of the buses in question from the initial rate of 34% to 55%.

8 The Bundesvergabeamt referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling in accordance with Article 177 of the Treaty establishing the European Community:

`1. May an individual derive, from Article 1(1) to (3), Article 2(1), (7) to (9) or any other provisions of Directive 92/13/EEC, a specific right to have review proceedings conducted before authorities or courts or tribunals complying with Article 2(9) of Directive 92/13/EEC which is so sufficiently precise and specific that, in the event of non-transposition by a Member State of the provisions of the directive in question, an individual may rely on that provision?

If Question 1 is answered in the affirmative:

2. In conducting a review procedure, must a national court having the attributes of the Bundesvergabeamt disregard provisions of national law such as Paragraph 7(2) in conjunction with Paragraph 67(1) of the Bundesvergabegesetz which preclude it from conducting a review procedure even where such review procedure is intended by the national legislature solely to serve the purpose of transposing Directive 89/665/EEC?

If Question 1 is answered in the affirmative:

3. Must the adjudicating court disregard those or any comparable procedural provisions of national law in such circumstances, if they impede or prevent a review procedure from being effectively conducted?'

9 Written and oral observations were submitted by the Republic of Austria and the Commission of the European Communities. Oral observations were also submitted by NOVOG.

III - Analysis

A - Jurisdiction

10 For the reasons stated in my Opinion in Walter Tögel v Niederösterreichische Gebietskrankenkasse, (15) which draw upon the Opinion of Advocate General Léger and the judgment of the Court in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria AG and Others v Strohal Rotationsdruck GesmbH, (16) I would first observe that the Bundesvergabeamt is, in my view, `a court or tribunal of a Member State' for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty.

B - The first and second questions

11 It is common ground that the Utilities Review Directive should have been, but had not been, implemented in Austria on the date that the contract was awarded and on that on which EvoBus sought to initiate review proceedings pursuant to that directive, viz. 19 July 1996. In the first and second questions, the national court asks whether an individual has a directly effective right to bring review proceedings of the type provided for in Article 2 of the Utilities Review Directive, similar to those enacted into national law by Part 4 of the BVergG, before the Bundesvergabeamt in respect of an award of a public contract in the transport sector. In Tögel, (17) the Court has been asked to address an almost identically worded question referred by the Bundesvergabeamt regarding Article 1(1) of the Review Directive (the equivalent of Article 1(1) of the Utilities Review Directive), in so far as it had been extended to public service contracts by Article 41 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (18) (hereinafter `the Services Directive'). The two cases differ in so far as the BVergG is silent as to the jurisdiction of the Bundesvergabeamt in respect of services, whereas the application of Part 4 of the BVergG is expressly excluded in respect of utilities. For reasons outlined below, this makes it necessary in the present case to address more fully the second question regarding the obligations and restrictions imposed by Community law when interpreting national law which is within the scope of an unimplemented directive.

12 In essentially similar circumstances to those of Tögel, in Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH v Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH (19) the German Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes (Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board) referred a question as to whether bodies set up by Member States under the Review Directive to review the procedures for the award of public contracts for works and supplies were competent, by virtue of Article 41 of the Services Directive, also to review the procedures for the award of public service contracts. The Court answered that such a result did not follow from Article 41. (20) It observed that it was for the legal system of each Member State to determine which court or tribunal has jurisdiction to hear disputes involving individual rights derived from Community law. Member States must ensure that those rights are effectively protected in each case. Otherwise, the Court does not involve itself in the resolution of questions of national jurisdiction. (21) Although Article 41 of the Services Directive requires the Member States to ensure effective review in the field of public service contracts, `it does not indicate which national bodies are to be the competent bodies for this purpose or whether these bodies are to be the same as those which the Member States have designated in the field of public works contracts and public supply contracts'. (22) This conclusion excluded the possibility of Article 41 of the Services Directive giving rise to a directly effective right to have review proceedings conducted before the Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes, because one of the essential elements was missing, that is, an identifiable person or body under a duty to conduct the review proceedings in question. (23)

13 The Court referred in Dorsch Consult to the duty of `all the authorities of Member States, including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts', to take all appropriate measures to achieve the result envisaged by a directive, which gives rise to the judicial obligation to interpret national law `as far as possible, in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive so as to achieve the result it has in view'. (24) This requires the national court to `determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring an appeal in relation to awards of public service contracts... [and] in particular whether such a right of appeal may be exercised before the same bodies as those established to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts'. (25)

14 I refer to my Opinion, also pronounced today, in Tögel, (26) in which I address certain additional arguments regarding the possible direct effect of Article 41 of the Services Directive and the effectiveness of judicial protection, and propose that the Court should respond to the Bundesvergabeamt's first two questions in that case in the same terms as the operative part of the judgment in Dorsch Consult.

15 The same reasoning applies, in principle, to Article 1(1) of the Utilities Review Directive, although its application by a national court may be complicated by the fact that Article 2(1) contains alternatives regarding the remedies to be made available which are not contained in Article 2(1) of the Review Directive. However, the conclusion proposed in Tögel must be modified in the light of the issue expressly raised by the Bundesvergabeamt in the second question, that is, the permissibility in Community law of disregarding national legal provisions such as Paragraph 7(2) of the BVergG which expressly exclude it from conducting review proceedings in respect of contract awards in the sectors governed by the Utilities Review Directive. (27)

16 The interpretative obligation of national courts, to which the Court referred in Dorsch Consult, was first identified by the Court in Von Colson and Kamann v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen, (28) in which the Court also remarked that it was for the national court alone to rule on a question concerning the interpretation of its national law (29) and that it must comply with the obligation to interpret national law in conformity with the requirements of Community law, `in so far as it is given discretion to do so under national law'. (30)

17 In Kolpinghuis Nijmegen, (31) the Court introduced a significant qualification to the interpretative obligation of national courts first outlined in Von Colson and continued:

`However, that obligation on the national court to refer to the content of the directive when interpreting the relevant rules of its national law is limited by the general principles of law which form part of Community law and in particular the principles of legal certainty and non-retroactivity.' (32)

The Court stated that its ruling concerned `the limits which Community law might impose on the obligation or power of the national court to interpret the rules of its national law in the light of the Directive'. (33) Although that case concerned the liability in criminal law of persons who act in contravention of the provisions of a directive, those principles are also of application in situations where Community law has purely civil consequences.

18 The limits imposed on the national court's interpretative obligation, having regard to the degree of discretion accorded by national law and to the general principles of Community law, are summed up, in my view, by the vital qualification of that obligation in Marleasing and subsequent cases as one of interpreting national law, `as far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the directive'. (34) The Court acknowledged in both Wagner Miret (35) and Faccini Dori v Recreb (36) that national courts may sometimes be unable to interpret national provisions in a way which conforms to a directive and that, in such cases, following Francovich and Others, (37) the Member State concerned may be obliged to make good the loss and damage sustained as a result of the failure to implement the directive.

19 The limits imposed by the Court on national courts' interpretative obligation in Von Colson and in Kolpinghuis Nijmegen are not of the same character. The judgment in Von Colson refers to the extent of the national court's interpretative discretion as a matter of national law. In Kolpinghuis Nijmegen, on the other hand, the Court identified a negative restriction on the national court's obligation and power arising from Community law itself, a restriction which, therefore, is applicable irrespective of the discretion accorded by the national canons of construction. Advocate General Van Gerven, in his Opinion in Marleasing, drew attention to the way in which the interpretative obligation was `restricted by Community law itself'. (38) This can be explained by the fact that national authorities, including national courts, are subject to the general principles of Community law when implementing Community law or interpreting national provisions implementing such law. (39)

20 The agent for Austria suggested at the oral hearing that the principle of attributed competence in Austrian law made it unlikely that the BVergG could be construed in order to extend the competence of the Bundesvergabeamt to types of contract which were not expressly referred to in the relevant provisions, and that this argument applied a fortiori in the case of expressly excluded sectors. (40) It is, therefore, merely in order to furnish the fullest possible answer to the second question from the point of Community law that I express my view that, quite independently of the level of interpretative discretion accorded by national law, it would be contrary to the Community-law principle of legal certainty for a directive to be deemed to be implemented in national law by legislation which, on its face, as in Paragraph 7(2) of the BVergG, expressly excludes the application of the relevant legislative provisions to the fields governed by the directive. Such an interpretation would leave individuals in a state of uncertainty as to their rights. As well as being contrary to the general principles of Community law, that uncertainty would endanger the achievement of the result envisaged by the directive. Such an interpretation could not, therefore, deprive individuals of a right to compensation in respect of injury suffered due to the non-implementation of the directive in question, pursuant to the Court's judgment in Francovich and Others. (41)

21 To conclude my analysis in this section, I propose that the Court respond to the first and second questions referred by the Bundesvergabeamt by reiterating the first two sentences of the operative part of its judgment in Dorsch Consult, appropriately amended to refer to Article 1(1) of the Utilities Review Directive, and supplemented by the following statement:

It would, however, be contrary to the principle of legal certainty for Article 1(1) of the Utilities Review Directive to be deemed to be implemented by national legislation establishing bodies to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts which, on its face, expressly excludes the application of the relevant legislative provisions to the fields governed by that Directive.

C - The third question

22 The third question essentially relates to the applicability of the time-limit established by Paragraph 92(3) of the BVergG for the commencement of review proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt. The Bundesvergabeamt made the question conditional upon an affirmative answer to the first question. In the light of my recommendation to the Court that Community law precludes the competence of the Bundesvergabeamt in the present case, the time-limit for the introduction of an action before that body is irrelevant. It is not, therefore, necessary to propose a formal response to the third question. For the sake of completeness, however, I will address briefly the possibility raised by the Court's case-law of the exceptional non-application of national time-limits for the commencement of proceedings in respect of rights contained in an unimplemented directive.

23 This possibility was first raised in Emmott. (42) In that case, the Court observed (43) that the laying down of reasonable time-limits which, if unobserved, bar proceedings, in principle satisfies the conditions laid down for the application of national procedural rules in Rewe v Landwirtschaftskammer Saarland (44) and in Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v San Giorgio, (45) that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions and that they do not render impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law. The Court also held in Emmott, however, that `until such time as a directive has been properly transposed, a defaulting Member State may not rely on an individual's delay in initiating proceedings against it in order to protect rights conferred upon him by the provisions of the directive, and that a period laid down by national law within which proceedings must be initiated cannot begin to run before that time'. (46)

24 However, the Court has held in a number of subsequent cases, most recent of which is Fantask and Others v Industriministeriet (Erhvervsministeriet), (47) that `the solution adopted in Emmott was justified by the particular circumstances of that case, in which the time-bar had the result of depriving the applicant of any opportunity whatever to rely on her right to equal treatment under a Community directive'.

25 For the purposes of the present case, it is necessary to note that the rules on the award of contracts by entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, set out in the Utilities Directive, appear to have been implemented in Austrian law at the material time through the BVergG. The agent for Austria observed at the oral hearing that, in the absence of an express attribution of competence to the Bundesvergabeamt, the ordinary civil courts would hear cases regarding alleged breaches of the BVergG. If that is the case, and if those courts dispose of a satisfactory range of potential remedies, it cannot be said, despite the statement in the second recital in the preamble to the Utilities Review Directive that `existing arrangements at... national level... for ensuring... application [of the Utilities Directive] are not always adequate', that EvoBus has been deprived of any opportunity whatever to rely on its rights under the Utilities Directive. The situation would be different, of course, if, pending the implementation of the Utilities Review Directive, no national court had competence to enforce the provisions of the Utilities Directive, whether as transposed by the BVergG or by virtue of the principle of the direct effect of directives, or if a competent national court did not provide adequate remedies to ensure the protection of rights under the Utilities Directive, despite its Community-law obligation to do so. In that case, however, the most appropriate response might be the initiation of proceedings for State liability in accordance with the Court's judgment in Francovich and Others. (48)

26 In the circumstances of the case, it is not necessary for me to address the separate issue of whether the time-limit imposed by Paragraph 92(3) of the BVergG is a reasonable one.

IV - Conclusion

27 In the light of the foregoing, I recommend that the Court respond as follows to the questions referred by the Bundesvergabeamt:

It does not follow from Article 1(1) of Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors that, where that directive has not been transposed by the end of the period laid down for that purpose, the appeal bodies of the Member States having competence in relation to procedures for the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts may also hear appeals relating to procedures for the award of contracts in those sectors. However, in order to observe the requirement that domestic law must be interpreted in conformity with Directive 92/13/EEC and the requirement that the rights of individuals must be protected effectively, the national court must determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring an appeal in relation to awards of contracts in the relevant sectors. It would, however, be contrary to the principle of legal certainty for Article 1(1) of Directive 92/13/EEC to be deemed to be implemented by national legislation establishing bodies to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts which, on its face, expressly excludes the application of the relevant legislative provisions to the fields governed by that Directive.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Saggio delivered on 24 September 1998.
Josef Köllensperger GmbH & Co. KG and Atzwanger AG v Gemeindeverband Bezirkskrankenhaus Schwaz.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tiroler Landesvergabeamt - Austria.
National 'court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty - Procedures for the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts - Body responsible for review procedures.
Case C-103/97.

1 By order of 17 February 1997, the Tiroler Landesvergabeamt (Procurement Office of the Land of Tyrol) submitted to the Court two questions for a preliminary ruling concerning the interpretation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (1) (hereinafter `the Review Directive').

Community and national legislation

2 Article 1(1) of the Review Directive, as amended by Article 41 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, (2) requires the Member States to take the measures necessary to ensure that decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and in particular as rapidly as possible on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

3 Article 2(7) requires the Member States to ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

4 The next paragraph of that article has particular relevance in this case. It will therefore be helpful to reproduce it in full:

`Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.

The members of such an independent body shall be appointed and leave office under the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office, and their removal. At least the President of this independent body shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. The independent body shall take its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard, and these decisions shall, by means determined by each Member State, be legally binding.'

5 Article 5 of the directive requires Member States to bring into force the measures necessary to comply with the directive before 21 December 1991. Under Article 168 of the Act of Accession, (3) the time-limit laid down for the Republic of Austria was 1 January 1995.

6 The Review Directive was transposed into Austrian law at Federal level by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen (Federal Law on the Award of Public Contracts). (4) Each of the nine Länder then adopted its own law relating to the award of public contracts; in the case of the Land of Tyrol, the law in question is the Tyrolean Vergabegesetz (hereinafter `the TVerG') of 6 July 1994. (5)

7 The second part of that law (Paragraphs 5 to 14) governs the procedures for the review of decisions awarding public contracts. Paragraph 6 entrusts the conduct of review procedures to the Landesvergabeamt

(Land Public Procurement Office; hereinafter `the Office'). Under Paragraph 6(1), that body consists of seven members: a president, who must be familiar with the business of public procurement; a public servant of the Office of the Tyrolean Land Government with a knowledge of law, acting as rapporteur; a member drawn from the judiciary; and four other members, one each proposed by the Tyrolean Chamber of Commerce, the Chamber of Architects and Consulting Engineers for Tyrol and Vorarlberg, the Tyrolean Chamber of Workers and Employees and the Tyrolean Association of Municipalities.

8 Paragraph 6(3) provides that the members of the Office are appointed by the Tyrolean Government and remain in office for five years. They leave office early by resignation or if they are removed. In that regard, Paragraph 6(4) provides that an appointment must be revoked if the conditions for appointment are no longer fulfilled or if factors arise which prevent proper performance of the duties and `are likely to do so for a long time'.

9 Under Paragraph 6(6), the Office may take decisions when it has been properly convened and when the president, the rapporteur, the member drawn from the judiciary and at least one other member are present. Decisions are taken by a simple majority of the votes cast. In the event of a tie, the president's vote is decisive. Abstention is not allowed.

10 In accordance with Paragraph 6(7), the members of the Office are not to be bound by instructions in the performance of their duties. Their decisions are not liable to be set aside through administrative channels.

11 Paragraph 7(1) provides that it is for the Tyrolean Land Government to adopt the Office's rules of procedure. Those rules must, in particular, contain detailed provisions on the organisation and conduct of hearings, the discussion and voting processes, the drawing up of minutes and the preparation and drawing up of decisions. According to Paragraph 4 of the rules, (6) the hearing begins with the report by the rapporteur who is also responsible for gathering evidence and conducting other preparatory inquiries. All decisions adopted by the Office must be in written form and state reasons.

12 Paragraph 10 of the law specifies the powers conferred on the Office. Upon application, it may review the legality of decisions taken by contracting authorities and, in particular, may set aside such decisions prior to the award of the contract (Paragraph 12(1)); moreover, after the contract has been awarded, it may examine whether the fact that it was not awarded to the best bidder was due to a breach of the law (Paragraph 12(2)). In the course of that procedure, the Office must assess whether the contract would not in any case have been awarded to the successful bidder even if there had been no breach of the law as alleged in the application. If the contracting authorities' decision is set aside, the competitor whose bid was rejected in breach of the provisions in force may claim damages in the civil courts.

Facts and the questions submitted

13 The main proceedings arose from the award by the Gemeindeverband Bezirkskrankenhaus Schwaz (association of municipalities for the Schwaz district hospital) of a contract for works in connection with the extension to the said hospital. The undertakings Josef Köllensperger GmbH & Co. and Atzwanger AG brought review proceedings against that decision on 6 April 1995, claiming that the award should be set aside on the ground that it was in breach of the relevant provisions on the award of public contracts.

14 By decision of 27 June 1995, the Office rejected the application on the ground that the contract had in any case been awarded to the firm which had submitted the best bid, with the consequence that, even if the provisions of the law had been complied with, the contract would not in any event have been awarded to the applicants. The latter then challenged that decision before the Constitutional Court which, by judgment of 12 June 1996, set it aside on the ground that it had infringed the right, guaranteed by the Austrian constitution, to proceedings before the court specified by law. The Constitutional Court observed that the composition of the Office was not in accordance with the requirements of the review directive since its president did not have the necessary legal and professional qualifications for judicial office.

15 The composition of the Office was therefore modified. The president previously in office was replaced by an official of the administrative authority, who was qualified to practise law. Following resumption of the proceedings, the Office, which had reservations as to whether its composition (in particular as regards the members proposed by the organisations) satisfied the requirements of the directive, decided to submit the following two questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

`(1) Is Article 2 of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 to be interpreted as meaning that the Procurement Office of the Land of Tyrol, established by the Law of the Land of Tyrol on the award of contracts of 6 June 1994 (LGBl. No 87/1994), is a review body within the meaning of Article 2(8) of the Directive?

(2) Does the abovementioned law on the award of contracts adequately provide for the transposition into national law of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, in relation to the review procedures mentioned in Article 1 thereof?'

Admissibility

16 It is necessary, first of all, to establish whether the Office has the power, by virtue of the provisions governing its structure and forms of procedure, to make a reference to the Court under the preliminary ruling procedure. In its written observations, the Commission expresses reservations as to the admissibility of the questions in so far as they were submitted by a body which, for a number of reasons, could not be regarded as a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the EC Treaty. (7)

17 It is well known that, for reasons connected with the uniform application of Community law, the concept of a `court or tribunal' which is competent to submit questions for a preliminary ruling has a meaning independent of the definitions to be found in the national legal systems. (8) As the Court has consistently held, (9) in order to determine whether a body making a reference is a court or tribunal for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty, the Court takes account of a number of factors, such as whether the body is established by law, whether it is permanent, whether its jurisdiction is compulsory, whether its procedure is inter partes, whether it applies rules of law and whether it acts as a third party and is independent. It is therefore appropriate at this stage to determine whether the conditions to which I have just referred are fulfilled by the body which has requested the Court's intervention in this case.

18 It should be pointed out in this connection that the Austrian law assigns the task of reviewing the legality of decisions concerning the award of contracts exclusively to the Public Procurement Office (Paragraphs 5 and 10 of the TVerG). That law also provides that its decisions are binding by operation of law (Paragraph 12 of the TVerG); in addition, since the Office constitutes a `collegiate body with a judicial element' as referred to in Article 133 of the Austrian Constitution, its decisions are not liable to be set aside or varied through administrative channels (Paragraph 6(7) of the TVerG). It therefore follows that the Office is established by law and that its jurisdiction is compulsory. A similar positive assessment is also called for with regard to its permanence, since the Office sits permanently. The fact that its members remain in office for a limited number of years (five) is irrelevant in that regard since it is well known that the term of office of the members of a court can be limited to a specified period, provided only that the period in question is predetermined by law and not left to the discretionary choice of the person who has the power of appointment. Finally, there is no doubt that the Office applies rules of law when it reviews the legality of decisions relating to the award of contracts (Paragraph 8 of the TVerG).

19 With regard to the principle that its procedure must be inter partes, it is clear from the relevant legislation that the Office is also required to observe that principle in connection with its activity.

In this regard, it should be borne in mind that, in its judgment in the Dorsch Consult case, the Court observed, first of all, that the requirement in question is not an `absolute criterion', (10) and that it also considered it sufficient for the parties to the procedure before the procurement review body to be heard before any determination is made by the chamber concerned. It therefore held that a procedure in which the authority required to settle a dispute is obliged to hear the parties before making its determination is `inter partes'.

I am of the opinion that the same conclusion can be reached in this case, given that the Tyrolean law provides, in Paragraph 7(1), that hearings with the participation of the parties must be conducted before the Office and that more specific rules on the organisation and conduct of those hearings must be inserted, as has in fact been the case, in the internal rules of procedure. (11)

20 In accordance with those rules, the parties in the main proceedings were heard and had the opportunity to submit observations before the Office made its determination on the substance of the application. There can therefore be no doubt that, in this case, the proceedings were conducted in observance of the inter partes principle, as the Court understands that principle.

21 Finally, it remains to be established whether the structure and operation of the Office satisfy the conditions concerning the third-party status and independence of the judicial body.

It is well known that any body which purports to exercise judicial functions must, in principle, guarantee a high degree of imperviousness to any outside influence which could, if only potentially, compromise its independence of judgment in relation to the disputes which it is called upon to determine. That requirement is even more evident in cases such as this, where, on the one hand, the administrative authority has the power to appoint and remove the members of the Office and, on the other, it is also a party in the cases brought before the latter. (12)

22 In accordance with the shared legal traditions of the Member States, the Community concept of a court or tribunal implies that the provisions governing the composition and activities of any judicial body must guarantee, in strict terms, the independence and third-party status of its members. (13) That applies, in particular, to provisions conferring on the administrative authority the power to remove members of the body. Clearly, a power of that kind must be exercised only in exceptional cases, and the provisions conferring it on the executive must therefore specify, as transparently and exhaustively as possible, the grounds on which the members of the body may be removed.

23 That having been said in general terms, coming now to the case in point, it should be noted that, in its written observations, when it contested the admissibility of the questions, the Commission cast doubt, from several points of view, on whether the condition of independence was fulfilled by the rules governing the composition and operation of the Office. At the hearing, however, the Commission indicated that it had modified its position, which it justified by a (general) reference to the judgment in the Dorsch Consult case.

24 In the written procedure, the Commission relied, firstly, on the fact that the member of the Office who acts as rapporteur is an official of the administrative authority who is on leave of absence, arguing that, in view of the importance of the role played by the rapporteur within the Office, such a situation was not compatible with the position of the judicial body as a third party.

I do not consider that criticism well founded. The fact that a member of the Office is drawn from the administrative authority is not, by itself, sufficient to compromise his freedom of judgment, which must be guaranteed by the set of rules governing the operation of the body. It should be added that the Austrian legislature itself has taken account of that requirement by providing in the law establishing the Office that, irrespective of their background, its members are not to be subject to instructions in the exercise of their functions (Paragraph 6(7)).

25 Secondly, the Commission observes that the fact that the Tyrolean law contains no provision for members of the Office to be challenged or to withdraw is not compatible with the condition of independence. Such provisions should, for example, be applied when members have participated, as officials of the administrative authority, in the award of the contract in question. According to the Commission, that gap in the law is all the more serious in view of the `structural' proximity of the Office to the administrative authority whose actions it is required to review.

The absence of any rules governing challenges to and withdrawals by members of the judicial body compromises that body's independence, as the Commission concluded in its written observations. Moreover, that gap cannot be remedied by applying by analogy the corresponding provisions relating to members of the judiciary, since that subject is bound up with the principle of the court specified by law and therefore needs an explicit and exhaustive set of rules.

26 Finally, the Commission disputes the compatibility of the rules governing removal from office of members of the body with the principle of the independence of the judicial body. It points out that the provisions on removal contained in Paragraph 6(4) of the law establishing the Office are worded too vaguely. In addition to a reference to circumstances in which the conditions required for appointment are no longer fulfilled, which obviously does not give rise to any problems of interpretation, Paragraph 6(4) also provides that the administrative authority may annul the appointment if factors arise which prevent proper performance of the duties and `are likely to do so for a long time'. It is this latter provision which, according to the Commission, appears difficult to reconcile with the principle of the independence of the judicial body.

The Commission's position seems reasonable. The provision cited above actually renders identification of the judge uncertain because the power of the government authority to remove members of the judicial body is not contingent upon clearly defined situations, and that is manifestly contrary to the principle of the court specified by law. Nor does it seem to me to be possible to compensate for that by the application by analogy of rules relating to the removal of members of the judiciary, since the provision as it stands shows the intention to confer an extremely wide power on the government authority. The vagueness of the provision and the consequent broad discretion conferred on the executive also make it very difficult, if not impossible, to institute a judicial review of any steps taken to remove a member of the Office.

In conclusion, the provision of the law establishing the Office which governs the sensitive matter of the removal of its members uses a formula which appears too vague to serve as a guarantee against undue interference or pressure on the part of the executive. (14)

27 That conclusion is not contradicted, but rather confirmed, by the judgment given recently by the Court in the Dorsch Consult case. In that case, the judicial nature of the German body responsible for reviewing public procurement awards (the Vergabeüberwachungsausschuss des Bundes) had been called into question precisely on the ground that it did not satisfy the criteria of independence and third-party status in relation to the executive. However, that precedent does not seem to me to be relevant. The Court considered that the doubts expressed by both the Commission and the Advocate General (15) were unfounded, on the ground that the German legal system expressly provides that the provisions on the removal of judges apply to the members of the Federal body competent to review public procurement awards and that they also govern directly the questions of challenge and withdrawal. The Court gave the following reasons for its position: (16) `Under Paragraph 57c(3) of the HGrG, the main provisions of the Richtergesetz concerning annulment or withdrawal of their appointments and concerning their independence and removal from office apply by analogy to official members of the chambers. In general, the provisions of the Richtergesetz concerning annulment and withdrawal of judges' appointments apply also to lay members. Furthermore, the impartiality of lay members is ensured by Paragraph 57c(2) of the HGrG, which provides that they must not hear cases in which they themselves were involved through participation in the decision-making process regarding the award of a contract or in which they are, or were, tenderers or representatives of tenderers'.

28 It is clear from that passage that the Court considers it essential, in order to ensure the independence and third-party status of judges, that the exceptional circumstances justifying challenges to members of the body should in any event be specified in the provisions regulating its operation or, as in the case of removal, that an express reference should be made to the legislation applicable to judges. While it is true that, in its judgment in the Dorsch Consult case, the Court referred to the application by analogy of the German legislation concerning the removal from office of judges, that must be more correctly understood as a reference to particular provisions relating to the circumstances of a different case, in so far as applicable. There is no such reference in the Tyrolean law, which is why the passage of the judgment which I have just cited may not be relied on to support the opposite conclusion to that proposed here.

29 Nor is there any contradiction between the conclusions which I have reached and the fact that the Court has recently answered some questions submitted to it by the Federal Austrian authority responsible for review procedures in relation to the award of public contracts. In its judgment in the Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria AG and Others case, (17) the Court examined the substance of the questions raised by the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office) without examining the judicial nature of the body making the reference, whereas such an examination had been carried out by the parties and the Advocate General. Consequently, even if it is accepted that the Court had implicitly intended to recognise that body's competence to submit questions for a preliminary ruling, (18) the differences which can be found between the law establishing the Bundesvergabeamt and the law establishing the Tiroler Vergabeamt suggest that no importance should be attached to the circumstance to which I have just referred. Although it is true that the bodies are structured virtually identically and operate on the basis of similar rules, it is also true that the Federal rules are much more precise as regards the guarantees of independence and irremovability enjoyed by the members of the Bundesvergabeamt. In particular, unlike the Tyrolean law, the grounds for termination of the appointment of a member of the Federal Office are expressly and exhaustively set out in Paragraph 100 of the BVergG (Paragraph 79 of the previous version of the same law). (19) The same can be said with regard to the grounds on which parties may challenge members of the Office, which are expressly laid down in the Federal law but not, as shown above, in the Tyrolean law.

30 In the light of all those considerations, I propose that the Court declare that the questions raised by the Tiroler Vergabeamt are inadmissible since they have been submitted by a body lacking the status of a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty.

The first and second questions submitted

31 Should the Court see fit, contrary to what I have suggested above, to regard the Office as a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177, thus overcoming all the uncertainties with regard to the position as third parties and independence of the members of the body, the problem would then arise of assessing the substance of the questions raised by the Office. The following observations will therefore be devoted to that assessment.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

32 As will be recalled, the Office seeks essentially to ascertain whether the rules governing its composition and operation comply with the requirements contained in the first subparagraph of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive.

In their written observations and during the oral procedure before the Court, the attention of the parties focused, in particular, on the profile of the president of the body in question, with a view to clarifying whether or not it satisfies the conditions set out in Article 2(8) of the Review Directive.

33 I would say at the outset that an analysis of that provision shows that the discussion referred to above is neither relevant nor necessary in this case. In order to substantiate that conclusion, it is essential to undertake a precise reading of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive.

34 The provision in question deals, it will be recalled, with the bodies responsible for review proceedings brought against decisions taken by the first-level authorities competent to award public contracts falling within the scope of the directive.

35 Article 2(8), and in particular the first sentence thereof, contemplates two different scenarios. Member States have the right to choose between two options when organising the system for reviewing decisions taken by the contracting authorities. The first option, which I shall describe as the `single-tier system', is to confer competence to hear review proceedings on `judicial bodies'. The second, which I shall call the `two-tier system' and which reflects the legislative position in several Member States at the time of the adoption of the directive, is to confer competence, in the first place, on first-instance review bodies which are not judicial bodies. The subsequent text of Article 2(8) applies exclusively to this second scenario. In such a case, the provision states that `provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body'.

36 The two-tier system is therefore characterised by the intervention, in the first place, of a non-judicial body which is required to give written reasons for its decisions concerning measures taken by the contracting authorities. In addition, those decisions must themselves be able to be the subject of judicial review or review before a body which is a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 and is independent both of the contracting authority and of the first-instance review body. The subsequent text of Article 2(8) of the directive refers to that independent body as a court or tribunal as referred to in Article 177, which must satisfy certain `special' requirements relating to the conditions under which its members are appointed and leave office, the qualifications of its president, the procedure to be followed by it, and the binding nature of its decisions.

37 The task of assessing accurately the legislative purport of the provision in question is by no means a simple one. What is crucial for our purposes is to clarify what the directive meant by the phrase `bodies ... judicial in character' in the first sentence of Article 2(8). It must be ascertained whether that phrase is to be construed as a reference to the Community concept of `court or tribunal' or as a reference to national law.

38 I take the view that the former interpretation is the correct one, so that account is taken of the whole of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive only if the body responsible for review procedures is not a $court or tribunal$ as referred to in Article 177 of the Treaty and is therefore not a body entitled to submit questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling. In such a case, the provision in question requires Member States which adopt the two-tier system to allow a re-examination, in any event, of the decisions taken by the first-instance review body in the form of a judicial review or a review by another body which is a `court or tribunal' as referred to in Article 177.

39 The rationale of the system as a whole, as the Austrian Government and the Commission acknowledged at the hearing, is to ensure that, whenever decisions taken by the contracting authorities are reviewed, there can be intervention by a body which, by virtue of its `judicial' nature, is entitled to submit questions for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice, even if that body is not formally part of the judicial system of the Member State in question. Thus, bodies responsible for review procedures can obtain from the Court, when they find it necessary to do so, a ruling on the interpretation of the provisions of the Community directives in the field of public procurement (including, clearly, the Review Directive).

40 However, if the Office is considered to be a body entitled to submit questions to the Court of Justice - and is therefore a court or tribunal as referred to in Article 177 -, it follows that the requirements of supervision which underlie the `two-tier' option are irrelevant in this case since the body which deals, at first (and sole) instance, with review procedures is itself entitled to make references to the Court. It would therefore make no sense, from that point of view, to require decisions taken by a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 to be subject to review by another body in turn entitled to make references to the Court. I reiterate: the requirement to provide in any event for the intervention of a body which is a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 is clearly redundant in cases such as this, where the body responsible for review procedures is, by definition, regarded as a `court or tribunal'; it is relevant only if, in a two-tier system, the first tier is represented by a `purely' administrative body which, as such, falls outside the definition of a court or tribunal as referred to in Article 177.

41 The conclusion which I have reached makes it unnecessary for me to consider the substance of the two questions submitted by the Office, concerning the interpretation of the second subparagraph of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive. As will be recalled, that provision concerns the specific conditions to be satisfied by the independent body which deals with cases at second instance in the $two-tier$ system. It is therefore clear that the clarifications sought by the national authority are not relevant in this case since that part of the provision is not applicable to the Public Procurement Office established by the Tyrolean law. The issue raised by the referring authority therefore boils down to that of the admissibility of the questions submitted, which has already been examined. It is only within that framework, and not as part of the interpretation of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive, that any assessment can be made of the status of the members of the body, their independence in relation to the executive power and to the parties, the conditions governing their appointment and removal, and so on. It is therefore not crucial, for example, to assess whether the president of the Office has the same personal and professional qualifications as a member of the judiciary and whether those qualifications must be determined by reference to a `national' or `Community' concept of a court. That condition is peculiar to the `two-tier' system which the directive conceives of as a possible alternative available to Member States when establishing a national system of review procedures. However, it is not in itself a decisive criterion for regarding a body as a `court or tribunal' for the purposes of Article 177.

42 It should be added that, always assuming that the body in question is to be regarded as a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177, the conclusion which I have reached is the only one which allows the Tyrolean system of reviewing awards of public contracts to be included within the scope of the Review Directive. Indeed, if the Landesvergabeamt were to be regarded as a `court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177' as referred to in the last sentence of the first part of Article 2(8), and therefore as a `second tier' in the determination of review proceedings against the award of public contracts, the interpreter would be faced with the problem of identifying the first-tier review body which is not a `body... judicial in character' and whose decisions would have to be the subject of review by the Office. It will be noted that no such first-instance review body exists within the Austrian system since review proceedings against decisions taken by contracting authorities are brought at first and sole instance before the Landesvergabeamt.

43 In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the Court declare the questions referred by the Tiroler Landesvergabeamt inadmissible since that body is not a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty.

In the alternative, I propose that the Court reply as follows:

The second part of Article 2(8) of the review directive must be interpreted as meaning that the conditions set out therein apply exclusively to the composition of independent bodies responsible for the review of decisions taken by another body which is competent at first instance to hear and determine review proceedings against the award of public contracts and is not a court or tribunal as referred to in Article 177 of the EC Treaty. The provision in question is therefore not relevant for the purpose of assessing the composition and operation of the Tiroler Landesvergabeamt.

(6) - Rules published in the Tiroler LGBl., 1995, No 47.

(7) - It should, however, be pointed out that the Commission stated at the hearing that it had changed its view in the light of the position adopted by the Court in its judgment in Case C-54/96 Dorsch Consult [1997] ECR I-4961, paragraphs 22 to 38.

(8) - The independence of the Community concept of `court or tribunal' has been maintained by the Court since the judgment in Case 61/65 Vaassen-Göbbels [1966] ECR 377.

(9) - See, in particular, the judgments in the Vaassen-Göbbels case, cited above; in Case 14/86 Pretore di Salo [1987] ECR 2545; in Case 109/88 Danfoss [1989] ECR 3199; in Case C-393/92 Almelo and Others [1994] ECR I-1477; and, most recently, the judgment in the Dorsch Consult case, cited above, paragraph 23.

(11) - See Paragraph 4 of the Tyrol Land Government Regulation of 24 April 1995, Tiroler LGBl. 1995, No 47.

(12) - This is, of course, the situation which normally arises in the field of public contracts. It is precisely in order to avoid any adverse consequences stemming from the `structural' proximity between the `reviewer' and the $reviewed$ that the Review Directive lays down additional conditions to be satisfied by the body, a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty, called upon to resolve disputes concerning public contracts in the two-tier system. In particular, at least the president of the body is required to have the same legal and professional qualifications as a member of the judiciary. This system will be discussed below, at point 32 et seq.

(13) - The judgments which stress the importance of the conditions of independence and third-party status include those in the Pretore di Salo case, cited above, paragraph 7, Case C-24/92 Corbiau [1993] ECR I-1277, paragraph 15, and the Almelo case [1994], cited above, paragraph 21.

(14) - It is significant that the Austrian legal system itself contains different approaches to the operation even of bodies called upon to review, at sole instance, the legality of awards of public contracts. As is apparent from the circumstances of Case C-258/97 Hospital Ingenieure, in which I shall deliver my Opinion on 1 October 1998, the law on public contracts in force in Carinthia confers the abovementioned powers on the Unabhängiger Verwaltungssenat für Kärnten, a judicial body which derives the guarantees of its independence from the law establishing it, the power of removal being conferred on the senate itself and exercisable only in the circumstances expressly provided for by the law (Article 129b of the Austrian Federal Constitution).

(15) - See points 33 to 37 of the Opinion of Advocate General Tesauro [1997] ECR I-4976 et seq.

(16) - Judgment cited above, paragraph 36.

(17) - Judgment in Case C-44/96 [1998] ECR I-73.

(18) - In his Opinion delivered on 16 September 1997, at points 37 to 44, Advocate General Léger concluded in the affirmative. However, it is significant, for the purposes of this case, that at point 41 of his Opinion, in stating the grounds for his affirmative conclusion as regards the criterion of independence of the body, the Advocate General pointed out that an exhaustive list of the grounds for revocation is given in Article 79 of the BVergG (now Article 100 of the BVergG), which correspond to objective situations or, in the case of serious negligence, to omissions required by the Law to be so serious as to reduce the risk of arbitrary action or interference on the part of the administrative authorities.

(19) - Under Paragraph 100 of the BVergG, the appointment of a member of the Bundesvergabeamt is terminated for any of the following reasons: death or resignation from office; becoming ineligible to stand for election to Parliament; a finding by the body, meeting in plenary session, that he is incapable of performing his duties on account of serious physical or mental deficiencies; expiry of his term of office; a finding by the body, meeting in plenary session, that he has committed a serious breach of duty; resignation from the judiciary or other appointing body.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Fennelly delivered on 2 April 1998.
Walter Tögel v Niederösterreichische Gebietskrankenkasse.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public service contracts - Direct effect of a directive not transposed into national law - Classification of services for the transport of patients.
Case C-76/97.

I - Introduction

1 This case relates to the award of a public service contract for the transport of persons, with or without medical attendance, to and from hospitals and medical centres. It raises, in particular, questions regarding the bodies competent to review such contracts and the availability of remedies where the relevant Community directives have not been implemented in time, the categorisation of the services in question and the contract award procedures which should, accordingly, be followed, the direct effect of the legislative provisions concerning these procedures, and the effect of the implementation of the applicable directive on pre-existing contracts.

II - Legal and factual context

A - Community law

2 Article 1 of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (1) (hereinafter referred to as `the Review Directive'), as amended, provides as follows:

`(1) The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national (2) rules implementing that law. (3)

(2) Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings claiming injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.'

Article 2 of the Review Directive provides, in relevant part, as follows:

`(1) The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

(2) The powers specified in paragraph 1 may be conferred on separate bodies responsible for different aspects of the review procedure.

...

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(6) The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.

(7) The Member States shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

(8) Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.

The members of such an independent body shall be appointed and leave office under the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office, and their removal. At least the President of this independent body shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. The independent body shall take its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard, and these decisions shall, by means determined by each Member State, be legally binding.'

3 Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (4) (hereinafter referred to as `the Services Directive') establishes procurement procedures for certain types of public service contracts. The seventh recital in the preamble to the Services Directive provides as follows:

`Whereas the field of services is best described, for the purpose of application of procedural rules and for monitoring purposes, by subdividing it into categories corresponding to particular positions of a common classification; whereas Annexes I A and I B of this Directive refer to the CPC nomenclature (common product classification) of the United Nations; whereas that nomenclature is likely to be replaced in the future by Community nomenclature; whereas provision should be made for adapting the CPC nomenclature in Annexes I A and I B in consequence.'

4 The twenty-first recital in the preamble to the Services Directive reads, in relevant part, as follows:

`Whereas full application of this Directive must be limited, for a transitional period, to contracts for those services where its provisions will enable the full potential for increased cross-frontier trade to be realised; whereas contracts for other services need to be monitored for a certain period before a decision is taken on the full application of this Directive.'

5 Article 1 of the Services Directive defines a number of terms employed in the Directive. Article 2 governs the scope of the Directive relative to that of Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts. (5) Article 3 of the Services Directive provides for the application, without discrimination, of the provisions of the Directive to the award of public service contracts, to design contests and to service contracts publicly subsidised by more than 50% which are awarded in connection with works contracts within the meaning of Article 1a(2) of Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts. (6) In particular, Article 3(1) provides as follows:

`In awarding public service contracts or in organising design contests contracting authorities

shall apply procedures adapted to the provisions of this Directive.'

Articles 4 to 6 of the Services Directive provide for the non-application of that Directive in a variety of specified exceptional situations. Article 7 of the Services Directive provides for the application of the Directive to public service contracts with an estimated value, net of VAT, which is not less than ECU 200 000, and identifies the methods by which contracts are to be valued.

6 Article 8 of the Services Directive provides for the observance of the detailed award procedures in Titles III to VI in the case of contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A to the Services Directive. Article 9 states that contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I B shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16 of the Services Directive, which relate only to technical specifications and the notification of the results of award procedures. The procedure applicable to contracts whose subject-matter falls within both Annexes is dealt with as follows by Article 10 of the Services Directive:

`Contracts which have as their object services listed in both Annex I A and I B shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI where the value of the services listed in Annex I A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex I B. Where this is not the case, they shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.'

7 Title III of the Services Directive regulates the choice of award procedures and the rules governing design contests. Title IV relates to technical specifications for public service contracts. Title V establishes common advertising rules. Title VI is divided into three chapters, which set out, respectively, common rules on participation by service providers in the contract award process, criteria for qualitative selection and criteria for the award of contracts.

8 Annex I A to the Services Directive lists services within the meaning of Article 8. It includes, in Category No 2, the subject `Land transport services, including armoured car services, and courier services, except transport of mail', with the CPC reference numbers 712 (except 71235), 7512, 87304. Annex I B lists services within the meaning of Article 9 of the Services Directive, and includes Category No 25, whose subject is `Health and Social Services'. Its CPC reference number, 93, is provided in the third column of the Annex.

9 CPC reference number 712 is a subdivision of Division 71 (`Land transport services') and is entitled `Other land transport services'. (7) Subdivision 712 includes `Non-scheduled passenger transportation' (7122), which is further subdivided into `Taxi services' (71221), `Rental services of passenger cars with operator' (71222), `Rental services of buses and coaches with operator' (71223), `Passenger transportation by man- or animal-drawn vehicles' (71224) and `Other non-scheduled passenger transportation n.e.c.' (71229). (8) In Division 93 of the CPC (`Health and Social Services'), subdivision 931 on `Human health services' includes `Other human health services' (9319), one of the elements of which is headed `Ambulance services' (93192), followed by the fuller description: `[g]eneral and specialised medical services delivered in the ambulance'.

10 The fifth recital in the preamble to Council Regulation (EEC) No 3696/93 of 29 October 1993 on the statistical classification of products by activity (CPA) in the European Economic Community (9) (hereinafter `the CPA Regulation') reads as follows:

`Whereas the international compatibility of economic statistics requires that the Member States and the Community institutions use product classifications by activity which are directly linked to the United Nations Central Product Classification (CPC).'

Article 1(1) of the CPA Regulation states that `[t]he purpose of this Regulation is to establish a classification of products by activity within the Community in order to ensure comparability between national and Community classifications and hence national and Community statistics'. (10)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

Article 1(3) states: `This Regulation shall apply only to the use of this classification for statistical purposes'. Article 3(1) of the CPA Regulation states, in relevant part, that `[t]he CPA shall be used by the Commission and the Member States as a classification'.

11 The CPA comprises a Division 60, `Land Transport...' and a Division 85, `Health and Social Work Services'. Although the component groups, classes and categories are not divided in precisely the same way as is done in the CPC, (11) their order and content are essentially similar. The CPA subcategories 60.23.14, `Other non-scheduled passenger transportation n.e.c.', and 85.14.14, `Ambulance services', are stated to correspond, respectively, to CPC reference numbers 71229 and 93192.

12 The Commission adopted a Common Procurement Vocabulary (CPV) in 1996. (12) The preface states that the main CPV is `a detailed adaptation, tailored to the needs of public procurement, of the CPA ... nomenclature.... The CPV will ultimately become a harmonised nomenclature that will replace the different ones referred to in the public procurement directives'. In Division 60 of the CPV, reference number 60231400-0 relates to `Other non-scheduled passenger transport n.e.c.', while in Division 85, reference number 85141400-3 relates to `Ambulance services'.

13 The fifth and sixth recitals in the preamble to Commission Recommendation 96/527/EC of 30 July 1996 on the use of the Common Procurement Vocabulary (CPV) for describing the subject-matter of public contracts (13) (hereinafter `the CPV Recommendation') state that the CPV is an adaptation of the CPA and that the CPA, in turn, `offers a fixed correspondence with the CPC nomenclature of the United Nations'. It is recommended that the CPV be used by contracting authorities and contracting entities covered by the various public procurement directives (14) in notices of public contracts submitted to the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities, and by suppliers of goods, works and services and their agents to describe contracts of interest to them.

B - Implementation in national law

14 By virtue of Article 65 of and Annex XVI to the Agreement on the European Economic Area signed at Oporto on 2 May 1992, the Republic of Austria was obliged to transpose into national law, by 1 January 1994 at the latest, (15) a number of Community acts in the field of public procurement, including the Review Directive in its original version. The Review Directive was transposed at federal level by the Bundesgesetz über die Vergabe von Aufträgen or Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law, hereinafter `the BVergG'), (16) which entered into force on 1 January 1994. The BVergG established a conciliation procedure before the Bundesvergabekontrollkommission (Federal Procurement Review Commission) and a review procedure before the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office). The review competence of the Bundesvergabeamt was established by the BVergG only in respect of awards of public supply and works contracts.

15 By virtue of Article 168 of the Act concerning the conditions of accession of the Kingdom of Norway, the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden and the adjustments to the Treaties on which the European Union is founded, of 24 June 1994, (17) the Services Directive, including Article 41 amending the Review Directive, was required to be transposed into Austrian law by the date of accession, viz. 1 January 1995. (18) Transposition at federal level took place by means of an amendment to the BVergG, (19) which extended the review competence of the Bundesvergabeamt to awards of public service contracts and which entered into force on 1 January 1997.

16 Austrian social security institutions are legally obliged to reimburse transport costs to insured persons in the event that those persons or members of their families need medical assistance. Such reimbursement covers the costs of transport within national territory, on the one hand, for hospitalisation, to the nearest suitable clinic or from there to the patient's residence and, on the other hand, for out-patient treatment, to the nearest suitable doctor or health centre, at contractually agreed rates. In practice, a broad distinction is drawn between transport of patients by emergency-doctor vehicle (accompanied by the doctor on emergency call and a paramedic), rescue and patient transport (accompanied by a paramedic) and ambulance journeys (without medical attendance). Relationships between the social security institutions and the transport operators are governed by private-law contracts. It appears that doctors are provided and paid separately in the case of transport by an emergency-doctor vehicle, so that their presence and activities in the ambulance do not form the subject-matter of such contracts.

C - Facts and proceedings

17 In 1984, the Gebietskrankenkasse Niederösterreich (Sickness Insurance Fund for Lower Austria, hereinafter `the defendant') entered into framework agreements of unlimited duration with the Austrian Red Cross, regional section for Lower Austria, and the Austrian federation of Samaritan workers, for the provision of patient transport of all three types. The framework agreement provides for tariffs to be fixed by a related agreement and for annual tariff negotiations to be concluded within two months. The framework agreement can be terminated by either party, subject to three months' notice in writing, at the end of any calendar year.

18 On 1 December 1992, the Bezirkshauptmannschaft Wien Umgebung (Chief Local Government Office for Vienna and District) granted Walter Tögel (hereinafter `the applicant') a licence to carry on a hire-car business, limited to rescue and patient transport. However, the defendant refused the applicant's repeated requests for a direct charging contract for rescue and patient transport, on the ground that care was adequately provided through the two existing agreements. The applicant applied to the Bundesvergabeamt to commence review proceedings under Paragraph 91(2) of the BVergG on 22 August 1996, that is, before the amendment of that law which transposed the Services Directive. He sought the remedy set out in Article 2(1)(b) of the Review Directive, arguing that the dispute concerned a service within the meaning of Annex I A to the Services Directive and that a public tender procedure should, therefore, be carried out.

19 The Bundesvergabeamt stayed the proceedings and referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling in accordance with Article 177 of the Treaty establishing the European Community:

`1. May an individual derive, from Article 1(1) and (2), Article 2(1) or any other provisions of Council Directive 89/665/EEC on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, a specific right to have review proceedings conducted before authorities or courts which comply with the provisions of Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665/EEC, which right is so sufficiently precise and specific that, in the event of non-transposition of the Directive in question by the Member State, an individual may successfully assert that legal right against that Member State in legal proceedings?

2. In conducting a review procedure on the basis of an individual's right, founded on Article 41 of Directive 92/50/EEC in conjunction with Directive 89/665/EEC, to the conduct of a review procedure, must a national court having the attributes of the Bundesvergabeamt disregard provisions of national law such as Paragraph 91(2) and (3) of the Bundesvergabegesetz, which confer on the Bundesvergabeamt powers of review only in the case of infringements of the Bundesvergabegesetz and regulations adopted thereunder, on the ground that those provisions preclude a review procedure from being conducted under the Bundesvergabegesetz for awards of contracts for services, and must such a national court conduct a review procedure in accordance with the fourth part of the Bundesvergabegesetz?

3.(a) Are the services mentioned in the facts of the case (with reference to Article 10 of Directive 92/50/EEC) to be classified as services coming under Annex I A, Category No 2 (Land transport services) and contracts for such services thus to be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III and IV of the Directive, or are they to be classified as services coming under Annex I B to Directive 92/50/EEC (Health services) with the result that contracts for such services are to be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Articles 13 and 14, or do those services fall entirely outside the sphere of application of Directive 92/50/EEC?

(b) Do the provisions of Articles 1 to 7 satisfy the preconditions laid down in paragraph 12 of the judgment in Case 41/74 Van Duyn v Home Office on the direct applicability of a Community Directive, with the result that services coming under Annex I B to the Directive are to be awarded under the procedure therein mentioned or are the relevant provisions of the Directive for the services mentioned in Annex I A capable of fulfilling the preconditions laid down in the abovementioned case?

4. Is there under Article 5 or other provisions of the EC Treaty, or under Directive 92/50/EEC, an obligation on the State to interfere in existing legal situations concluded for an indefinite period or for several years but which were not entered into in accordance with the abovementioned directive?'

20 Written and oral observations were submitted by the defendant, the Republic of Austria and the Commission of the European Communities. Oral observations were also submitted by the applicant and the French Republic.

III - Analysis

A - Jurisdiction

21 I would first observe that the Bundesvergabeamt is, in my view, `a court or tribunal of a Member State' for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty. To this end, I adopt fully the reasoning of Advocate General Léger in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria AG and Others v Strohal Rotationsdruck GesmbH. (20) Furthermore, this reasoning appears to have been implicitly accepted by the Court, whose judgment examined the questions referred by the Bundesvergabeamt in that case without a preliminary analysis of their admissibility. (21)

B - The first and second questions

22 The Services Directive contains the substantive provisions on the award of public contracts for services as well as providing for the extension to the field of services of the review procedures set out in the Review Directive. It is common ground that the Services Directive should have been, but had not been, implemented, in Austria on the date the applicant sought to initiate review proceedings in accordance with Article 2(1)(b) of the Review Directive, viz. 22 August 1996. In the first and second questions, the national court asks whether there is a directly effective right to have review proceedings conducted before authorities or courts which comply with the provisions of Article 2(8) of the Review Directive, which an individual can assert in order to have such proceedings conducted before the Bundesvergabeamt in respect of an award of a contract for services, despite the attribution of competence by the BVergG to that body only in respect of contracts for works or for supplies.

23 In essentially similar circumstances, the German Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes (Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board) referred a question in Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH v Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH (22) as to whether bodies set up by Member States under the Review Directive to review only the procedures for the award of public contracts for works and supplies were competent, by virtue of Article 41 of the Services Directive, to review also the procedures for the award of public service contracts. The Court answered that such a result did not follow from Article 41 of the Services Directive. (23) It observed that it was for the legal system of each Member State to determine which court or tribunal has jurisdiction to hear disputes involving individual rights derived from Community law. Member States must ensure that those rights are effectively protected in each case. Otherwise, the Court does not involve itself in the resolution of questions of jurisdiction. (24) Although Article 41 of the Services Directive requires the Member States to ensure effective review in the field of public service contracts, `it does not indicate which national bodies are to be the competent bodies for this purpose or whether these bodies are to be the same as those which the Member States have designated in the field of public works contracts and public supply contracts'. (25)

24 This conclusion excluded the possibility of Article 41 of the Services Directive giving rise to a directly effective right to have review proceedings conducted before the Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes, because one of the essential elements was missing, that is, an identifiable person or body under a duty to conduct the review proceedings in question. (26) It implicitly rejects the argument initially submitted by Austria (but, in light of Dorsch Consult, not pursued at the oral hearing) that in the case of partial implementation of the Review Directive through the establishment in respect of works and supplies of a review body such as the Bundesvergabeamt, that body is sufficiently closely related to the omitted field of services for its competence, as a matter of Community law, to be extended to that field. In response to Austria's contention that the Bundesvergabeamt has jurisdiction `proximate' to that in the Directive, the defendant disputed the existence of such a notion in Austrian law and, in my view, correctly observed that the degree of clarity of a directive cannot be assessed, for the purposes of determining whether it is directly effective in the absence of adequate transposition, by reference to the existing content of national rules, which will vary between Member States.

25 The present case is quite different, in my view, from the situation in a case such as Factortame and Others, (27) which was mentioned by the Bundesvergabeamt in its order for reference. In that case, the Court required the national court to set aside a national rule precluding, in certain circumstances, the grant of interim relief, which was deemed essential for Community-law rights to have full force and effect. However, it was clear that the national court, the House of Lords, had jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the dispute and was properly seised of it. (28) I do not accept the applicant's argument that, as a matter of Community law, all national courts and tribunals have jurisdiction to apply all directly effective provisions of Community law in the absence of a domestic-law provision expressly excluding such jurisdiction. (29) As Advocate General Tesauro said in his Opinion in Dorsch Consult, `this would encroach on the domain of the national legislator'. (30)

26 The Court referred, however, in Dorsch Consult to the duty of `all the authorities of Member States, including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts', to take all appropriate measures to achieve the result envisaged by a directive, which gives rise to the judicial obligation to interpret national law, as far as possible, in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive. (31) This requires the national court to `determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring an appeal in relation to awards of public service contracts ... [and] in particular whether such a right of appeal may be exercised before the same bodies as those established to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts'. (32)

27 The Bundesvergabeamt refers in its order for reference to a decision of the Verfassungsgerichtshof (Austrian Constitutional Court) of 11 December 1995. (33) The Verfassungsgerichtshof doubted, on similar grounds to those outlined above, whether Article 1(1) of the Review Directive, as amended by Article 41 of the Services Directive, gave rise to a directly effective right for individuals to bring review proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt in respect of public service contracts. This would, it said, prejudge a decision reserved for the national legislature on whether to frame review proceedings in the field of services in the same way as for works or supply contracts, or to make other arrangements for legal protection in this area consistently with the requirements of Community law. That, of course, is a matter to be resolved exclusively by the national legal system.

28 If the Bundesvergabeamt is ultimately found not to enjoy the claimed jurisdiction, two principal options remain open to individuals who seek a remedy for an alleged breach of the terms of the Services Directive.

29 The Court observed in Dorsch Consult that where a Member State has failed to take the implementing measures required, individuals might be able to rely, as against that Member State, on the substantive provisions of the Services Directive. (34) The possible direct effect of certain of those provisions is considered below, in response to the third question. Were any of those substantive provisions to have direct effect, it would be a clear violation of Community law if an individual had no actual possibility of relying upon it for want of a court, whether specialised or of general jurisdiction, to hear his case. (35) Austria stated at the oral hearing that disputes regarding public procurement awards which are outside the competence of the Bundesvergabeamt are deemed to be contractual disputes within the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil courts. (36) Only the national courts can resolve this issue.

30 Alternatively, the persons concerned may use the appropriate domestic-law procedures to claim compensation for damage incurred owing to the failure to transpose the Services Directive within the time prescribed. (37) The existence of these potential remedies does not, however, affect my conclusion regarding the issue raised by the first and second questions, which I would answer in the same terms as the operative part of the judgment in Dorsch Consult.

C - The third question, part (a)

31 By this question the Bundesvergabeamt is seeking guidance as to the classification as between Annexes I A and I B, respectively, for the purpose of applying Article 10 of the Services Directive to the services `mentioned in the facts of the case'. As I have already mentioned, a practical distinction is drawn in the transport of patients between transport by emergency-doctor vehicle (accompanied by the doctor on emergency call, whose presence is not the responsibility of the service provider), rescue and patient transport (accompanied by a paramedic) and ambulance journeys (without medical attendance). It appears that the applicant is only licensed to provide services of the second type, and it was in respect of such rescue and patient transport that he applied to the defendant for a contract. The defendant relies on the prior existence of the framework agreements, which provide for patient transport of all three types. In the light of the defendant's existing practice, I will address this question as if it related to the content of those framework contracts, although the response I propose should also assist in determining the appropriate procedure for the award of a contract of more limited scope.

32 In responding to this question, I can state at once that I share France's view that the CPC provides the only binding guide to the interpretation of the service categories set out in Annexes I A and I B to the Services Directive. The seventh recital in the preamble to the Services Directive, quoted at paragraph 3 above, shows clearly that the references in the Annexes to the CPC are not merely indicative, but rather that the categories used `correspond... to particular positions of a common classification', the CPC. This intention appears unambiguously, not only from the terms of the recital but also from the material terms of the Annexes. Public authorities and affected undertakings and individuals are entitled to as much clarity as possible in dealing with technical rules which govern the action they are required to take.

33 Although the CPA nomenclature has been established by a binding act, the CPA Regulation, it is clearly intended for purposes other than the interpretation of the Services Directive, that is, as its Article 1(3) states, `for statistical purposes'. The more general statement in Article 3(1) of the CPA Regulation that `[t]he CPA shall be used by the Commission and the Member States as a classification' cannot, in my view, in the absence of a further legislative act, override the earlier description of its objectives in Article 1(3). The fact that the CPA is employed for classification purposes under Directive 93/36/EEC coordinating the procedures for the award of public supply contracts (38) does not indicate that its normal scope of application should be extended to fields other than that governed by that Directive.

34 On the other hand, the CPV, although expressly intended for use in the field of procurement, is the subject only of a Commission recommendation which, by virtue of Article 189 of the Treaty, has no binding effect. It cannot, therefore, be deemed to be the eventual replacement of the CPC, for the purposes of Annexes I A and I B, that is envisaged in the seventh recital in the preamble to the Services Directive. Although the preface to the CPV suggests that it will ultimately serve that intended function, the CPV Recommendation confines itself to urging the use of that nomenclature in preparing notices and other communications in the procurement field. Given that neither the CPV nor the CPV Recommendation refers to the use of the Annexes to the Services Directive to determine the appropriate contract-award procedure, it cannot be deemed, for present purposes, to have the interpretative value of a recommendation `designed to supplement binding Community provisions'. (39)

35 I do not accept the Commission's argument that the CPC-based lists in Annexes I A and I B should be interpreted with the aid of the CPA or the CPV. The fifth recital in the preamble to the CPA Regulation indicates that the CPA is `directly linked' to the CPC, for the purposes of `the international compatibility of economic statistics', whereas the sixth recital in the preamble to the CPV Recommendation states that the CPA `offers a fixed correspondence with the CPC nomenclature'. The fifth recital describes the CPV, for its part, as `an adaptation of the CPA'. In the circumstances, it seems to me more logical to construe the CPA and CPV by reference to the temporally prior CPC than to do the opposite. (40) I should add, for the sake of completeness, that I can detect nothing in the CPA and CPV nomenclatures which would affect in any way my interpretation of the CPC-based lists in the Services Directive's Annexes, read on their own.

36 Although it might be initially tempting, given the simple title `Ambulance services' of CPC reference number 93192, to allocate the contractual services at issue in this case in their entirety, or at least those which involve some level of medical attendance, to Category No 25 `Health and Social Services' (CPC reference number 93) in Annex I B, closer examination shows that this would not be justified. In the first place, the explanatory note to this category reads: `General and specialised medical services delivered in the ambulance'. Secondly, this reference number must be read in its context. `Human health services' (931) includes `Hospital services' (9311), `Medical and dental services' (9312), and `Other human health services' (9319), which is further subdivided into `Deliveries and related services, nursing services, physiotherapeutic and paramedical services' (93191), `Ambulance services' (93192), `Residential health facilities services other than hospital services' (93193) and `Other human health services n.e.c.' (93199). These simple service titles, amplified by the more detailed descriptions which accompany them, show that this Division of the CPC focuses only on the medical aspects of health services, to the exclusion of non-medical aspects. (41)

37 `General and specialised medical services delivered in the ambulance' (93192) would cover the attendance of a nurse or paramedic. This category should not, however, cover the simple transport costs of fuel, driver and acquisition of a vehicle of the requisite size and power, just as general hospital catering services, for example, should not be included, in my view, under CPC reference number 93110 `Hospital services'. The excluded transport elements should, instead, be classified in Category No 2 of Annex I A to the Services Directive, `Land transport services...', corresponding to CPC reference number 71229 `Other non-scheduled passenger transportation n.e.c.'.

38 I do not accept the applicant's argument that the fact that the Services Directive divides the services within its material scope into two classes, which are subject to different award procedures, affects this conclusion. The twenty-first recital in the preamble to the Services Directive indicates that the application of the full award procedure set out in Titles III to VI is limited, for a transitional period, `to contracts for those services where its provisions will enable the full potential for increased cross-frontier trade to be realised'. The defendant argued that the contractual services at issue should, thus, be classified in Annex I B, as no non-Austrian service provider had sought a contract and it would be impossible to provide the services in question from outside Austria. The nationality or place of establishment of the actual or potential tenderers in any given case does not appear to me to be relevant. Furthermore, the term `services' in the Services Directive should not be understood as relating only to economic activities within Chapter 3, `Services', of Title III of the Treaty. The Services Directive was adopted on the basis not only of Article 66 but also of Article 57(2) of the Treaty, which relates to establishment. Thus, service providers established in Austria from other Member States would also satisfy the criterion in the twenty-first recital.

39 The disputed public service contract, therefore, concerns three types of contractual service the common element of which - non-scheduled transport of passengers - would, taken on its own, come under Annex I A to the Services Directive, and the variable element of which - general and specialised medical services delivered in the ambulance - would, in the same circumstances, come under Annex I B. The Bundesvergabeamt and some of the parties who have submitted observations have suggested that the appropriate contract award procedure must, thus, be determined in accordance with Article 10 of the Services Directive. Articles 8, 9 and 10 provide for the application of the provisions of Titles III to VI or of Articles 14 and 16, respectively, by reference to the content of the `contracts' to be awarded. Where a contract has as its object exclusively `services listed' in either Annex I A or I B, either Article 8 or 9 applies. When it covers `services listed in both Annexes I A and I B', the applicable award procedure depends, pursuant to Article 10, on the relative values of the services covered by the contract.

40 I would first state that, in my view, the specific terms of Article 10 of the Services Directive prevail, in cases of conflict, over the interpretative rules of the CPC itself, as the CPC is simply used as a point of reference rather than to dictate the rules by which the appropriate award procedure is chosen. I have in mind, in particular, CPC interpretative rule B, which states, in relevant part:

`1. When services are, prima facie, classifiable under two or more categories, classification shall be effected as follows, on the understanding that only categories at the same level (sections, divisions, groups, classes or subclasses) are comparable:

(a) The category which provides the most specific description shall be preferred to categories providing a more general description.

(b) Composite services consisting of a combination of different services which cannot be classified by reference to 1(a) shall be classified as if they consisted of the service which gives them their essential character, in so far as this criterion is applicable.'

In the light of the foregoing analysis, `ambulance services' does not describe the services at issue more specifically than does `non-scheduled passenger transportation'. Furthermore, Article 10 clearly sets out a rule regarding contracts for multiple or composite services which is at variance with that in rule B 1(b) of the CPC. However, different means of applying Article 10 have been proposed.

41 France argued that a service could not come, simultaneously, under Annexes I A and I B to the Services Directive, and that the three distinct types of contractual service should be assessed in the light of the general nature of each service, according to the presence or absence of medical personnel, rather than by trying to assess the relative cost of the transport and medical elements of the three contractual services taken together. It concluded that ambulance journeys without medical attendance in ordinary vehicles came under Annex I A to the Services Directive, whereas patient transport accompanied by either a doctor or a paramedic in a specially-equipped vehicle should be deemed to come under Annex I B. It would then be necessary to assess whether the transport services involving medical attention or the simple ambulance transport service were greater in value, in order to determine, in accordance with Article 10, which of the award procedures referred to in Articles 8 and 9 of the Services Directive was applicable to the contract as a whole. This approach favours a priori the medical as opposed to the transport element of the contractual services in question when determining the applicable contract-award procedure.

42 On the other hand, the Commission, supported by the applicant, examined the transport of patients in the broadest sense, that is, without distinguishing between the three different contractual types of service. It argued that the transport of patients comprised certain services governed by Article 8 of the Services Directive and others governed by Article 9. Article 10 could, therefore, be applied in the light of the relative value of these two elements of the overall contract. The applicant contended that the transport element of the services provided was the greater.

43 Despite the ambiguous reference in Article 10 of the Services Directive to `services listed in both Annexes I A and I B', which could be read as establishing that certain service activities can be placed, simultaneously, in categories from both lists, France is correct, in my view, to suggest that this is not possible. It is necessary, in the light of the two-tier scheme of award procedures established by Articles 8 and 9, which is applied by reference to the ascription of a given service to one or other of the annexed lists, that the Annexes be deemed to be mutually exclusive.

44 However, I also take the view that the Commission's approach represents the better interpretation of Article 10 of the Services Directive. France's argument for a global approach, allocating each service in its entirety to either Annex I A or I B depending on the presence or absence of medical assistance, does not reflect the clear distinction in the Annexes between transport and `medical services delivered in the ambulance'. The notion in Article 10 of `services listed' in either Annex I A or I B is a Community-law notion. Accordingly, Community-law criteria - those used to subdivide the annexed lists into a number of categories by reference, in particular, to the CPC - should be used to identify and distinguish the various services which are the object of a single public service contract. This process would be distorted if it were forced to conform to a prior contractual subdivision of the relevant services into classes different from the categories set out in the Annexes to the Services Directive. The three types of contractual service provided for in the disputed contract cut across the categories of service employed in the Annexes, so that it would be impossible accurately to reflect the relative value of the services listed in Annexes I A and I B which are the object of the contract if the contract rather than the Annexes were used as the framework for analysis.

45 Article 10 requires, instead, that the value of each of the services which are the object of the contract, categorised in accordance with the scheme laid down in the Services Directive, be estimated separately, and then compared. In the present case, this would involve assessing the total value of the passenger-transport element of the three contractual service types, and comparing it with that of the medical services element which, of course, varies markedly between those three contractual service types.

46 I recognise, none the less, the validity of the submissions by France and Austria regarding the difficulty of conducting a valuation in accordance with service categories other than those employed by the contracting authority or parties themselves. The calculation of the relative value of a number of categories of service which are the object of a single public service contract also gives rise to difficulties of a more general kind. The tendering process is founded on the premiss that different service providers will have different cost structures, some more competitive than others. This may result in differing relative values, as between service providers, for the service categories which are taken into account in the total prices they quote for the services tendered or contracted for. Furthermore, it cannot be expected that a contracting authority will know in advance the exact relative cost for each potential service provider of the different service categories which constitute the object of an envisaged contract.

47 I do not wish to exaggerate the significance of these problems. In many, perhaps most cases, the obvious preponderance in relative value of one of the listed service categories will place the matter beyond dispute. Furthermore, although paragraphs (2) to (7) of Article 7 of the Services Directive appear to be chiefly concerned with the calculation of the total estimated value of a contract, for the purposes of satisfying the threshold for application of the Directive set out in Article 7(1), they furnish some guidance on how contracting authorities should estimate the value of the individual service categories which comprise a contract.

48 In cases where the contracting authority's estimate of the relative value of the service categories which are the object of a public service contract is disputed, recognition of the problems involved in preparing such an estimate in advance dictates that the burden of proving the contrary should be borne by the complaining party and that the authority be permitted a certain margin of appreciation. The complainant should have to demonstrate, on the basis of the information which was or should have been considered by the contracting authority, from previous contracts, commercial and accounting practice, past levels of demand and so on, and taking into account its margin of appreciation, that the values placed on the services were clearly incorrect. In the present case, it is for the competent national court to find the facts necessary for such a determination.

D - The third question, part (b)

49 In part (b) of the third question, the Bundesvergabeamt asks whether Articles 1 to 7 of the Services Directive, in the event that the limited award procedure for Annex I B services is applicable, and the provisions of its Titles III to VI, in the event of the full award procedure prescribed for Annex I A services being applicable, are capable of direct effect where that Directive has not been transposed in time in national law. Titles IV and V include, respectively, Articles 14 and 16 of the Services Directive, which are also applicable to the award of contracts for Annex I B services.

50 In paragraph 12 of its judgment in Van Duyn v Home Office, (42) the Court established the principle of the possible direct effect of unimplemented directives. The Court has consistently held that `wherever the provisions of a directive appear, as far as their subject-matter is concerned, to be unconditional and sufficiently precise, those provisions may, in the absence of implementing measures adopted within the prescribed period, be relied upon as against any national provision which is incompatible with the directive or in so far as the provisions of the directive define rights which individuals are able to assert against the State'. (43)

51 In Francovich and Others, the Court stated that it was `necessary to see whether the provisions of [the directive in question] which determine the rights of employees are unconditional and sufficiently precise. There are three points to be considered: the identity of the persons entitled to the guarantee provided, the content of that guarantee and the identity of the persons liable to provide the guarantee'. (44) Similarly, in the present case, it is necessary to determine which, if any, of the relevant provisions of the Services Directive are unconditional and sufficiently precise regarding the creation of rights for individuals, the identity of the individuals who are to benefit from those rights, and the identity of the public bodies under a duty to respect those rights.

52 For the purpose of such an inquiry, I would first observe that the application of the Review Directive to services strongly indicates that the Services Directive was intended to involve specific justiciable rights for individuals. I would add, secondly, that, although provisions of a directive which define its personal and material scope may not as such create rights for individuals, they are essential to the identification of the bearers of rights and duties and of the extent of rights and duties under the directive and may, read with substantive rights-creating provisions, be capable of direct effect. Thirdly, provisions of a directive whose application entails the exercise by Member State authorities of administrative discretion in accordance with prescribed criteria, as distinct from substantive discretion regarding the means of their transposition into national law, may be directly effective in the case of non-implementation. This is borne out by the decision in Van Duyn v Home Office regarding the criteria in accordance with which Member States were to take measures on grounds of public policy or public security, which were set out in Article 3(1) of Council Directive 64/221/EEC of 25 February 1964 on the coordination of special measures concerning the movement and residence of foreign nationals which are justified on grounds of public policy, public security or public health. (45)

53 On the other hand, in the light of the broadly similar content of the other public procurement directives, (46) the following statement by the Court regarding Directive 71/305 in CEI v Association Intercommunale pour les Autoroutes des Ardennes (47) should be borne in mind:

`The directive... does not lay down a uniform and exhaustive body of Community rules. Within the framework of the common rules which it contains, the Member States remain free to maintain or adopt substantive and procedural rules in regard to public works contracts on condition that they comply with all the relevant provisions of Community law....'

54 Areas not exhaustively regulated by the procurement directives include the determination of a contractor's financial standing, the fixing of a maximum value for works (48) and the imposition of conditions regarding the employment of unemployed persons. (49) By way of contrast, the Court found in Transporoute v Minister of Public Works (50) that Articles 23 to 26 of Directive 71/305, the equivalents of Articles 29, 30(2) and (3), 31 and 32(2) and (3) of the Services Directive, set out exhaustively the possible means of proof of a tenderer's good standing and qualifications (as distinct from his financial and economic standing).

55 The non-exhaustive character of the common rules established by the public procurement directives regarding certain aspects of the contract award procedure does not preclude the direct effect of those rules, in so far as they satisfy the test outlined above. Even if the non-exhaustive character of the procurement directives means that full compliance with them will not guarantee a remedy to an aggrieved service provider if he has not also complied with any applicable and compatible national requirements, those directives still afford, as Austria put it, certain minimum guarantees. In Beentjes v Netherlands State, (51) the Court found that no specific implementing measure was necessary for compliance with the requirements set out in Articles 20, 26 and 29 of Directive 71/305, the broad equivalents of Articles 23, 32 and 37 of the Services Directive, and that these could, therefore, be relied upon by an individual before the national courts. (52)

56 Turning now to the general provisions of the Services Directive, I am of the view that the bearers of rights and the public bodies bound by obligations under that Directive are sufficiently clearly identified by Article 1, as are the types of public service contracts to which the Directive applies by Articles 2 to 7. (53) Of particular importance is Article 3(1) of the Services Directive, which establishes an unconditional and precise right to the award of public service contracts in accordance with procedures adapted to the provisions of that Directive. I would add that the same is true of Articles 8 to 10 of the Services Directive, whereby the applicable contract award procedure is determined. These provisions, taken together, establish, in my view, the directly enforceable right of service providers to participate in the award of public service contracts in accordance with the provisions of the Services Directive, in so far as those detailed provisions themselves create rights for individuals, are unconditional and are sufficiently clear and precise to be enforceable in the absence of national implementing measures.

57 I am also of the view that the detailed provisions of Titles III to VI on the choice of award procedures, common technical and advertising rules, participation, and selection and award criteria are, subject to exceptions and qualifications which are apparent from their terms, unconditional, sufficiently precise and designed to create rights for individuals. These provisions specify in detail the obligations imposed on contracting authorities in order to secure access for service providers to the award procedures for public service contracts and are, for the most part, analogous to Articles 20, 26 and 29 of Directive 71/305, in that no specific implementing measure is necessary for compliance with them. (54) However, a comprehensive analysis of those provisions of Titles III to VI of the Services Directive which are or are not capable of direct effect is not warranted by the facts of the case as it now stands. Consideration of the quality of a particular provision should, in my view, await a concrete factual situation. It is, therefore, appropriate to limit the answer to Question 3(b) to Titles I and II of the Services Directive.

E - The fourth question

58 The fourth question referred by the Bundesvergabeamt seeks to establish whether a contracting authority is obliged to terminate or otherwise interfere with the operation of an existing contract which was concluded for an indefinite period but which was awarded prior to the date for transposition of, and otherwise than in accordance with, the provisions of the Services Directive. (55) In the absence of transposition of the Services Directive at the material time, this question is hypothetical. The Court stated in Faccini Dori v Recreb (56) that, in the absence of transposition of Council Directive 85/577/EEC of 20 December 1985 concerning protection of the consumer in respect of contracts negotiated away from business premises, (57) consumers could not derive from the directive itself an enforceable right of cancellation as against traders with whom they had concluded a contract. Despite the public or public-law character of contracting authorities, the same principle precludes, in my view, the existence of a Community-law right for a service provider, under the Services Directive, to require the cancellation of an existing contract between a contracting authority and another private party. The related principle that the State cannot rely upon an unimplemented directive so as to affect detrimentally the rights of individuals would also prevent a contracting authority from justifying its otherwise unlawful cancellation of such a contract by reference to the Services Directive. (58)

59 The question referred by the Bundesvergabeamt raises, none the less, the real possibility that, if the Services Directive were deemed to be capable, upon implementation, of affecting existing contracts, the aggrieved service provider could seek a remedy in respect of the contracting authority's non-observance, or the State's non-implementation, of the provisions of Titles III to VI of that Directive, in particular regarding services listed in Annex I A. The grant of a remedy in such circumstances is contingent on a determination of the requirements of the Services Directive upon full transposition.

60 In the context of the present case, this question raises three related issues, which I will address in the following order: first, whether the Services Directive applies retroactively to existing contracts; secondly, whether that Directive affects in any way national rules regarding the continued existence of a contract; and, thirdly, whether public authorities are obliged to use any power of termination granted by an existing contract. (59)

61 The principle of legal certainty normally precludes a Community measure from taking effect from a point in time before its publication, although it may exceptionally be otherwise where the purpose to be achieved so demands and where the legitimate expectations of those concerned are duly respected. (60) Furthermore, Community law presumes that, in the absence of a clear provision, legislation is not to be interpreted as having retroactive effect. (61) The Services Directive does not expressly state that it has retroactive effect. Article 44 merely requires the Member States to bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with the Directive before a specified date after its adoption. In addition, there is nothing either in the terms or the general scheme and objectives of the Services Directive which would suggest that it should have a general retroactive effect. Its title, the third recital in the preamble, Articles 3(1), 8 to 10 and 23, and Chapter 3 of Title VI all speak of procedures or criteria for the award of public service contracts, which implies that existing contracts, already awarded and concluded, are not, in principle, to be disturbed.

62 The Court has already observed that the procurement directives do not establish exhaustive sets of common rules regarding the award of public contracts. The directives lay down rules intended to ensure the openness and non-discriminatory nature of public procurement procedures but do not affect substantive national rules about the means of conclusion, validity, terms and duration of contracts which result from these procedures. (62) Indeed, the proper functioning of the Services Directive presupposes the continuing application of national rules to the conclusion of contracts subsequent to an award in accordance with its terms. This is borne out by the emphasis placed in the Services Directive on procedures which bind contracting authorities regarding the award of contracts, rather than binding both parties regarding the conclusion of contracts. Article 2(6) of the Review Directive illustrates the effects of this distinction, which preserves the role of national contract rules in the field of public procurement. It stipulates that the effects of the remedies provided for in that Directive, which are all directed against contracting authorities, on a contract concluded subsequent to its award by such an authority shall be determined by national law. The prospect that such a concluded contract would continue to be binding in national law appears to underlie the licence granted to the Member States by the Community legislator to limit the remedies available to an award of damages to any person harmed by an infringement by the contracting authority. It is ultimately for national law to determine whether the full effects of a contract are to be preserved in such circumstances.

63 In principle, therefore, national rules regarding the duration of contracts apply to contracts concluded before the date for transposition of the Services Directive. If the relationship between contracting parties is firm and binding in national law, so that even variations in price and other terms occur against the background of a continuing single binding contract, then it is not affected by the Services Directive. If, on the other hand, it amounts, in national law, merely to a long-standing relationship providing a framework for periodic renegotiation of terms, then, in my view, the procedures envisaged in the Services Directive must be followed at the first opportunity. Into which category a relationship falls is, in any event, a matter to be determined by national courts in accordance with their own law. Thus, where a framework contract concluded before the date for transposition of the Services Directive provides for the periodic renegotiation of certain of its terms, it is national contract law and the national courts which will determine whether the parties' relationship remains, at all times and in all circumstances (even if, for example, the renegotiation fails), subject to an existing binding contract. If, by virtue of national contract law, the renegotiation is deemed to give rise to a new contract, or the failure of the renegotiation is deemed to put an end to the contract, the new public service contract must be awarded in accordance with the terms of the Services Directive.

64 It may be argued that, irrespective of the outcome of the application of national rules, the objectives of the Services Directive dictate certain minimum criteria, applicable throughout the Community, for the determination of the continued existence of a contract. Such an argument could be based on the anticipated prejudice to the achievement of the objectives of the Services Directive if a considerable part of the public market for services, and, in particular, that for Annex I A services, were removed from its effective scope of application through contracts which were awarded before the date for transposition and which national law deemed to exist without interruption despite the renegotiation of certain key terms, such as those relating to price, (63) within the framework of the contract.

65 Although this argument correctly identifies the broad objectives of the Community's action in the field of public services procurement, it is not, in my view, consistent with the terms and scheme of the Services Directive. That Directive does not determine the conditions for the validity of contracts concluded subsequent to an award, nor, a fortiori, is there anything in its terms which would suggest that, for the purpose of determining the need for an award procedure, national rules on the validity or continued existence of contracts concluded before its date for transposition should be overridden. Furthermore, the principle of legal certainty requires that the rights of service providers under an otherwise valid subsisting contract be taken into account in the interpretation of the Services Directive. Article 2(6) of the Review Directive permits the preservation, by national law, of the effects of unlawfully awarded contracts, with the contracting authority being liable in damages to persons harmed by the infringement. If the argument outlined above were accepted, it would entail the grant of the remedies provided for in the Review Directive to interested service providers in the event of non-compliance with the terms of Titles III to VI of the Services Directive. This could leave a contracting authority in the invidious position of being bound, in national law, to continue to observe the terms, including those regarding price reviews, of what is regarded as a validly subsisting contract, while at the same time being bound in Community law, without having acted in any way unlawfully in awarding and concluding the contract, to compensate persons harmed by its failure, upon such a price review, to initiate a new contract award procedure. Such an arbitrary outcome is not warranted by the terms and scheme of the Services Directive.

66 Finally, it appears that at least one of the framework agreements at issue in the present case is terminable at the end of any calendar year upon three months' notice by either side. If that amounts, in national law, to a mere option to give notice of termination, without which a binding contractual relationship continues, then, in the light of my conclusion that the Services Directive does not have retroactive effect on such relationships, Community law does not require that a pre-existing option be transformed into an obligation. Therefore, on its own, such a right of termination does not, as a matter of Community law, attract the application of the award procedures laid down in that Directive.

IV - Conclusion

67 In the light of the foregoing, I recommend that the Court respond as follows to the questions referred by the Bundesvergabeamt:

(1) It does not follow from Article 41 of the Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts that, where that directive has not been transposed by the end of the period laid down for that purpose, the appeal bodies of the Member States having competence in relation to procedures for the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts may also hear appeals relating to procedures for the award of public service contracts. However, in order to observe the requirement that domestic law must be interpreted in conformity with Directive 92/50 and the requirement that the rights of individuals must be protected effectively, the national court must determine whether the relevant provisions of its domestic law allow recognition of a right for individuals to bring an appeal in relation to awards of public service contracts. In circumstances such as those arising in the present case, the national court must determine in particular whether such a right of appeal may be exercised before the same bodies as those established to hear appeals concerning the award of public supply contracts and public works contracts.

(2) The contractual services at issue comprise services some of which are to be classified as services coming under Annex I B, Category No 25 to Directive 92/50 (`Health and Social Services') and the remainder of which are to be classified under Annex I A, Category No 2 (`Land transport services, including armoured car services, and courier services, except transport of mail'). The award procedure is, therefore, to be determined in accordance with Article 10 of Directive 92/50, on the basis of the relative values of those two service categories under the contract as a whole. Where it is alleged, in a case governed by Article 10 of Directive 92/50, that a contract should have been awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI of that Directive, it must be demonstrated to the national court, on the basis of the information which was or should have been considered by the contracting authority, and taking into account that authority's margin of appreciation, that the value of the service listed in Annex I A to that Directive which constitutes part of the services contracted for in the disputed contract should have been estimated by the contracting authority to be greater than that of the constituent service listed in Annex I B.

(3) Subject to an assessment, in an appropriate concrete case, of whether the relevant provisions of Titles III to VI of Directive 92/50 create rights for individuals which are unconditional and sufficiently precise to be enforceable in the absence of national implementing measures, the right of service providers under Articles 1 to 10 of Directive 92/50, taken together, to participate in the award of public service contracts in accordance with the provisions of that Directive is capable of direct effect.

(4) Directive 92/50 does not apply retroactively to existing public service contracts concluded before the date for transposition of that Directive. It is a question of national law whether the renegotiation of terms agreed under an existing public service contract results in a break in the continuity of that contract, leading to the application of the relevant provisions of Directive 92/50 to the award of the subsequent contract. Community law does not require a contracting authority to use a right of termination provided for in a pre-existing public service contract after the date for transposition of Directive 92/50.

(34) - Paragraph 44. The Court's reference to Case C-253/95 Commission v Germany [1996] ECR I-2423, paragraph 13, indicates that it had in mind the principle of direct effect, rather than that of compensation for damage, which it raised in the immediately following paragraph of its judgment in Dorsch Consult.

(35) - See paragraph 48 of the Opinion of Advocate General Tesauro in Dorsch Consult.

(36) - It appears to me that the remedies prescribed in Article 2(1) of the Review Directive - interim measures, the setting aside of unlawful awards, and damages for loss - would, as a matter of Community law, have to be made available in the competent ordinary courts if the substantive provisions of the Services Directive were directly effective; see J.M. Fernandez Martín, The EC Public Procurement Rules: A Critical Analysis (Clarendon, Oxford, 1996), pp. 200-202, 227.

(37) - Paragraph 45. The Court cited Joined Cases C-178/94, C-179/94, C-188/94, C-189/94 and C-190/94 Dillenkofer and Others v Germany [1996] ECR I-4845.

(39) - See Case C-322/88 Grimaldi v Fonds des Maladies Professionnelles [1989] ECR 4407, paragraph 18.

(40) - In addition, it seems likely that the CPV was adopted after the contested refusal to award a contract to the applicant. He applied to the Bundesvergabeamt on 22 August 1996, whereas the CPV Recommendation had been adopted only on 30 July 1996. The CPV itself is undated, but the fact that the CPV Recommendation makes reference to it suggests simultaneous adoption. Furthermore, the CPV and the CPV Recommendation were published on the same date, 3 September 1996. The fact that this publication postdated the commencement of review proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt weakens further the case for its application in this case.

(41) - The sole possible exception is `Residential health facilities services other than hospital services' (93193), which is described as concerning `[c]ombined lodging and medical services'. It may have been felt to be necessary to refer expressly to the combination of lodging and medical services in order to prevent the exclusion of the former.

(46) - The twenty-second recital in the preamble to the Services Directive states that `the rules for the award of public service contracts should be as close as possible to those concerning public supply contracts and public works contracts'; the twenty-third recital states that `the procurement rules contained in Directives 71/305/EEC and 77/62/EEC can be appropriate, with necessary adaptations ...'.

(53) - Article 7(2)(8) of the Services Directive is not material to the direct effect of the Directive, as it does not concern the rights of individuals or the duties of the Member States.

(54) - See the finding of direct effect, discussed in the immediately foregoing paragraph, in Beentjes v Netherlands State, cited above.

(55) - It may be argued, on the basis of the judgment of the Court in Case C-129/96 Inter-Environnement Wallonie [1997] ECR I-0000, that Member States were under an obligation not to obstruct the future operation of the Services Directive in the period between its adoption and its date for transposition. Such an argument is not material in the present case, however, as the framework contracts in question were concluded before the adoption of the Services Directive. It is, therefore, more useful, for the purposes of the present discussion, to refer to the date for transposition of the Services Directive, when full effect was required to be given to its provisions.

(56) - Cited above, paragraph 25.

(57) - OJ 1985 L 372, p. 31.

(58) - See Case 80/86 Kolpinghuis Nijmegen [1987] ECR 3969, paragraph 9. In paragraph 8 of his Opinion in Marleasing, cited above, Advocate General Van Gerven referred to the Court's judgment in Kolpinghuis Nijmegen and added that legal certainty precluded an unimplemented directive from introducing a civil penalty, such as nullity.

(59) - Such an obligation, being based on the terms of the contract itself, would, if found to exist, bind the contracting authority even in the absence of transposition of the Services Directive.

(60) - Case 98/78 Racke v Hauptzollamt Mainz [1979] ECR 69, paragraph 20; Case C-368/89 Crispoltoni [1991] ECR I-3695, paragraph 17.

(62) - Furthermore, Article 7(2)(5) clearly envisages the possibility of public service contracts which are concluded, in accordance with its terms, for an indefinite duration.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Lenz delivered on 12 June 1997.
Commission of the European Communities v Italian Republic.
Failure to fulfil obligations - Directive 93/36/EEC - Failure to transpose within the prescribed period.
Case C-43/97.

1 In the present Treaty infringement proceedings, the Commission claims that the Italian Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 34(1) of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, (1) in that it has failed to adopt within the prescribed period or, as the case may be, to give notification of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with that directive.

2 Article 34(1) of Directive 93/36 requires Member States to bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with the directive before 14 June 1994 and immediately to inform the Commission thereof.

3 The defendant does not deny the failure of which the Commission complains. It submits, however, that such failure is of minor importance, since the basic Community provisions concerning procedures for the award of public supply contracts, laid down by Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (2) and by Directives 80/767/EEC of 22 July 1980 (3) and 88/295/EEC of 22 March 1988 (4) amending it, have been transposed into internal law. (5) That, however, does not invalidate the Commission's complaint that Directive 93/36 has not been transposed.

4 The defendant further submits that under a draft law currently being debated by the Italian Parliament the Government will be empowered to transpose Directive 93/36 into internal law.

5 As the defendant does not thereby contest that the directive in issue has not been transposed into internal law within the prescribed period, the Court does not have to consider the Commission's complaint concerning failure to give notification of the measures taken to transpose the directive.

6 I therefore propose that the Court should declare that, by failing to adopt within the prescribed period the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, the Italian Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 34(1) of that directive. I further propose that the Italian Republic should be ordered to pay the costs of the case.

(2) - OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1.

(5) - In order to understand this submission, it must be pointed out that the aim of Directive 93/36 is to recast Directive 77/62 and its amending directives (see the first recital in the preamble to Directive 93/36). Article 33 of Directive 93/36 consequently provides that Directive 77/62 is repealed.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General La Pergola delivered on 19 February 1998.
Gemeente Arnhem and Gemeente Rheden v BFI Holding BV.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Gerechtshof Arnhem - Netherlands.
Public service contracts - Meaning of contracting authority - Body governed by public law.
Case C-360/96.

I - Introduction

1 The purpose of the questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling in the present case is to clarify the concept of a body governed by public law within the meaning of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (1) (hereinafter the `Directive') and in particular to ascertain the precise meaning of the expression `body... established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character'.

II - Facts

2 In July 1994, the two municipalities that are the appellants in the main proceedings (Gemeente Arnhem and Gemeente Rheden, hereinafter the `municipalities') entrusted the tasks of refuse collection and disposal to a new legal entity, ARA Holding BV (hereinafter `ARA'), established expressly by them for that purpose. Those tasks had previously been carried out by the relevant municipal services. The two municipalities decided to hive off the work and entrust it to ARA, since, in view of the scale of the service and the cost of providing it, it was considered advisable (2) for the sake of economy to combine the management of those tasks and place it in the hands of a separate body established for that purpose.

3 In particular, the Arnhem Municipal Council's proposal of 25 May 1994 stated at point 10 that: `The municipalities participating in NV ARA shall grant concessions to ARA in respect of operations in any way connected with their legal obligations regarding refuse disposal and municipal cleansing. Those operations concern the collection of all household refuse and related activities, as well as the cleansing of public highways and marketplaces, gritting, weeding of paved areas, cleaning of street drains and elimination of vermin. In granting those concessions, the Municipality of Arnhem is not bound by the European rules concerning public service tendering with regard to those activities. The public services directive does not therefore apply. A "framework agreement" will be entered into between the Municipality of Arnhem and NV ARA, under which both parties will give an informal commitment to renew the concession.'

4 The Gerechtshof te Arnhem (Regional Court of Appeal, Arnhem) states that, on the basis of that proposal, the Municipal Council of Arnhem decided on 6 June 1994 to establish ARA and in the general interest to grant it `concessions and impose [on it] obligations concerning certain duties imposed by law with regard to refuse disposal and municipal cleansing... to be further specified in the contract to be entered into between the Municipality and NV ARA'. On 28 June 1994, the Municipal Council of Rheden passed a resolution in similar terms, except that municipal cleansing was not covered.

5 On 4 July 1994, the Municipality of Arnhem amended Article 2 of its Regulation on Waste as follows:

`The Environment and Public Works Department has hitherto been responsible for the refuse collection service pursuant to the applicable legislation and this regulation. As from 1 July 1994, that responsibility shall be transferred to NV ARA, the independent municipal cleansing agency.'

6 ARA had been established in the meantime on 1 July 1994 and Article 2 of its statutes states that the object of the company is to perform the following operations:

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

`(a) the performance of all economic operations aimed at collecting (or having collected and, so far as possible, recycling or having recycled), in an efficient, effective and environmentally responsible manner, waste such as household refuse, industrial waste and separable parts thereof, together with performance of activities relating to the cleaning of highways, the elimination of vermin and disinfection;

(b) the (joint) setting up, cooperation with, participation in, the (joint) provision of management and supervision for, as well as the taking over and financing of, other undertakings whose activities have any connection with the objects set out under (a);

(c) the performance of all economic operations which are connected with the foregoing or may be conducive to the operations, activities and action defined above (provided that needs in the general interest are thereby met).'

7 On 21 October 1994, the Municipality of Arnhem and ARA entered into a framework agreement covering the tasks to be performed. The Municipality of Rheden subsequently entered into a similar agreement with ARA.

Article 8 of those agreements, covering remuneration for the services in question, reads as follows:

`Rheden shall pay ARA remuneration for services rendered, at a rate to be specified.

The remuneration for services referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be defined in a financial clause to be added to the specifications and quality standards for each operation contained in the partial contracts.

The actual remuneration for services rendered will be fixed:

(a) either on the basis of the unit prices agreed beforehand for each operation, result or batch of work;

(b) or on the basis of a fixed price agreed beforehand for a particular task;

(c) or on the basis of an invoice for costs actually incurred.

Once a year, having due regard to the municipal annual planning schedule, ARA will submit in advance:

- in the circumstances described in Article 8(3)(a): a bid stating the cost for each operation, result or batch of work to be performed to the specifications and quality standards laid down for each activity;

- in the circumstances described in Article 8(3)(b): a bid stating the price for the particular task;

- in the circumstances described in Article 8(3)(c): an estimate of expected costs.

The amount of the remuneration to be paid pursuant to the financial clauses referred to in paragraph 2 shall thereafter be fixed annually in agreement with the authorities responsible for the budget. Should agreement not be reached with those authorities, an independent expert appointed by the most appropriate trade organisation for the operation in question will deliver a binding opinion on the actual amount of remuneration to be paid.'

8 In the event, it appears from statements made by the municipalities in the course of the proceedings that the procedure by which ARA is in fact paid for services rendered is as follows:

`1. ARA informs the municipal authorities in general terms of developments in the refuse collection sector and the effects they are expected to have on costs and income;

2. the municipal authorities prepare a provisional budget;

3. the municipalities pay ARA quarterly advances based on that budget;

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

4. ARA submits to the municipalities a monthly statement of costs incurred and income received;

5. a statement for tax purposes is prepared at the end of each financial year, showing costs incurred and income received in connection with the service, together with deductions in respect of the advances paid.'

9 It appears from the municipalities' pleadings that the work plan prepared for ARA by the municipal councils also specified that the remuneration paid to ARA should `cover the costs of the operations at socially and commercially acceptable rates.'

10 BFI Holding BV (hereinafter `BFI') is a private undertaking whose activities include the collection and treatment of household refuse and industrial waste. BFI brought an action before the Rechtbank te Arnhem (District Court, Arnhem), contesting the municipalities' decision to entrust the refuse collection and disposal service to ARA. BFI contended that the public services Directive applied to the relationship between the municipalities and ARA, and that the municipalities in question had failed to follow the procedure for the award of contracts laid down in the Directive.

In the proceedings at first instance, the municipalities took issue with BFI's view, contending that their relationship with ARA was in the nature of a concession and the Directive consequently did not apply. They also contended, in the alternative, that in any event the exception provided for in Article 6 of the public services Directive applied in the present case.

11 By judgment of 18 June 1995, the Rechtbank rejected the municipalities' contention that the arrangements at issue were concessions which did not fall within the ambit of the Directive. The court of first instance consequently ruled that the relationship in question constituted a service contract and that the exception referred to in Article 6 of the Directive did not apply in this case.

The municipalities brought an appeal against the decision at first instance before the Gerechtshof te Arnhem claiming that, on the contrary, the exception referred to in Article 6 of the public services Directive ought to apply in the case in question.

The court of appeal considered it necessary, for the purpose of resolving the dispute, to ascertain whether or not ARA was a body governed by public law within the meaning of the public services Directive and whether, in consequence, the municipalities were justified in claiming that Article 6 of the public services Directive exempted them from the obligation to follow the procedure for the award of contracts laid down in the Directive in so far as the task of providing the service at issue had been entrusted to ARA as a `body governed by public law' within the meaning of the Directive.

12 In order to determine whether ARA fulfils the requirements laid down in the Directive to qualify as a body governed by public law and to enable it thereby to give judgment, the Gerechtshof te Arnhem sought from the Court a preliminary ruling on the following questions:

`1. For the purposes of interpreting Article 6 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1, hereinafter referred to as "the Directive"), is the first indent of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of the Directive, which specifies that "body governed by public law means any body... established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character", to be interpreted as distinguishing

(i) between needs in the general interest and needs having an industrial or commercial character, or

(ii) between needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character and needs in the general interest having an industrial or commercial character?

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

2. If the answer to the first question is that the distinction to be drawn is that set out in (i),

(a) is the phrase "needs in the general interest" to be understood as meaning that there can be no question of meeting needs in the general interest where private undertakings meet such needs?

and

(b) if so, is the phrase "needs having an industrial or commercial character" to be understood as meaning that needs having an industrial or commercial character are met whenever private undertakings meet such needs?

3. If the answer to the first question is that the distinction to be drawn is that set out in (ii), is the difference between "needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character" and "needs in the general interest having an industrial or commercial character" to be determined according to whether (competing) private undertakings meet such needs or not?

4. Is the requirement that the body must be established "for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character" to be interpreted as meaning that such a "specific purpose" can exist only where the body was established exclusively to meet such needs?

5. If not, must a body meet needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, almost exclusively, substantially, preponderantly or to some other degree in order to be or remain able to meet the requirement that it must be established for the specific purpose of meeting such needs?

6. Does it make any difference to the answers to Questions 1 to 5 whether the needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, which the body was set up to meet, derive from legislation in the formal sense, from administrative provisions, from acts of the administration or otherwise?

7. Does it make any difference to the answer to Question 4 if responsibility for the commercial activities is entrusted to a separate legal entity forming part of a single group or concern within which activities meeting needs in the general interest are also carried out?'

III - The relevant Community provisions

13 The eighth recital in the preamble to the Directive reads as follows:

`Whereas the provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts; whereas the provision of services on other bases, such as laws or regulations, or employment contracts, is not covered;'.

14 Article 1 of the Directive provides:

`(a) "public service contracts" shall mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority...

(b) "contracting authorities" shall mean the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law...

"Body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality and

- financed, for the most part by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

The lists of bodies or of categories of such bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph of this point are set out in Annex I to Directive 71/305/EEC. These lists shall be as exhaustive as possible and may be reviewed in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 30b of that Directive.'

15 Article 6 of the Directive provides:

`This Directive shall not apply to public service contracts awarded to an entity which is itself a contracting authority within the meaning of Article 1(b) on the basis of an exclusive right which it enjoys pursuant to a published law, regulation or administrative provision which is compatible with the Treaty.'

16 Article 8 of the Directive provides:

`Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI.'

17 Article 9 of the Directive provides:

`Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I B shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.'

18 Article 10 of the Directive provides:

`Contracts which have as their object services listed in both Annexes I A and I B shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI where the value of the services listed in Annex I A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex I B. Where this is not the case, they shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.'

19 Annex I A, Services within the meaning of Article 8, lists under item 16:

`Subject: Sewage and refuse disposal services; sanitation and similar services. CPC Reference No: 94'

20 Annex I B, Services within the meaning of Article 9, lists under item 27:

`Subject: Other services. CPC Reference No: -.'

IV - Examination of the issues

A - Matters covered by the Directive

(a) The concept of service

21 The first matter to be considered in connection with the present dispute is the concept of `service' within the meaning of the Directive and it must be determined first of all whether the services that are the subject of the relationship at issue fall into the category for which the Directive requires the open competitive tendering procedure to be used.

It is scarcely necessary to point out, in this connection, that under Article 8 of the Directive the award of contracts for services listed in Annex I A is subject to all the procedural rules laid down in the Directive, whereas under Article 9 the award of contracts for the services listed in Annex I B is merely subject to the principle of non-discrimination and the rules on technical specifications laid down in the Directive. (3) In short, the Directive requires competition notices to be published and the other procedural rules for the award of public service contracts to be followed

only in the case of services listed in Annex I A. (4)

The categories of services listed in Annex I A include, under item 16, `sewage and refuse disposal services; sanitation and similar services.' For details of those services, the Annex refers to the CPC (United Nations common product classification) number quoted in the adjoining column for the category of services in question. The reasons that prompted the Community legislature to adopt this method of identifying the services falling within the ambit of the Directive are given in the seventh recital in the preamble to the Directive. In drafting the Directive, it was considered that `the field of services is best described, for the purpose of application of procedural rules and for monitoring purposes, by subdividing it into categories corresponding to particular positions of a common classification;... Annexes I A and I B of this Directive refer to the CPC nomenclature (common product classification) of the United Nations.'

22 Academic writers have already had occasion to draw attention to the various legal limitations and complications caused by this reference to rules originating outside the Community. (5) I should add, in this connection, that the CPC is not available in all the Community languages. This certainly does not help to put Member States' citizens on an equal linguistic footing and it clearly presents a problem for national authorities and national bodies required to apply the Directive when their working language is not the language in which the CPC is framed.

23 Writers on the subject (6) take the view that the list of services given in Annex I A is an exhaustive and restrictive list of the services required to comply fully with the Directive. The list of services in Annex I B also refers to the CPC nomenclature but ends with the generic residual category, `Other services'. This suggests, first, that the reference to the CPC nomenclature is to be interpreted literally and, second, that the categories listed in Annex I A are not to be interpreted broadly.

It must therefore be determined, first of all, whether the service in question is among those listed in Annex I A. (7) If that is not the case, it will of necessity be among those subject to the rules laid down in the Directive for services listed in Annex I B.

24 As regards the services at issue in the present proceedings, another aspect of the wording used in item 16 of Annex I A requires clarification: refuse collection, which represents no small part of the work the municipalities entrusted to ARA, does not at first sight appear to be among the services listed under item 16, which relate on the contrary - to use the term employed in that item - to refuse disposal. However, in the text supplied to the Court by the Commission, CPC Reference No 94, quoted for the category in question, cites the following services under sub-heading `94020 Refuse disposal services': `Collection service of garbage, trash, rubbish and waste, whether from households or from industrial and commercial establishments, transport services and disposal services by incinerators or by any other means. Waste reduction services are also included.'

From the foregoing considerations, it therefore appears clear that refuse collection and disposal services are among those listed in Annex I A to the Directive and are therefore required to comply fully with its provisions.

(b) The concept of service contract

25 The second point to be considered in connection with the scope of the Directive ratione materiae is the nature of the relationship between the municipalities and ARA.

The eighth recital in the preamble to the Directive (8) states in that connection that the Directive covers contracts only. The provision of services on other legal bases `is not covered'. We also know from Article 1(a) that, for the purposes of the Directive, service contracts mean `contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority.'

26 It should also be noted in this connection that the reason for the restriction mentioned in the twelfth recital in the preamble to the Directive is to be found in the origins of the public services Directive. In the version originally proposed by the Commission, (9) the Directive was intended to cover both service contracts and service concessions. In the course of the legislative procedure, the Council subsequently decided that concessions should not come within the scope of the Directive, (10) which consequently - in the version that entered into force - covers only service contracts.

The view commonly taken, (11) in the absence of a specific Community definition embodied in legislation, (12) is that the distinction in Community law between service contracts and service concessions is based on a number of criteria. The first concerns the recipient or beneficiary of the service provided. In the case of a contract the beneficiary of the service is deemed to be the contracting authority, whereas in the case of a concession the beneficiary of the service is a third party unconnected with the contractual relationship, usually the community, which receives the service and pays an appropriate sum for the service rendered. Under Community law, the service that is the subject of a service concession must also be in the general interest, so that a public authority is institutionally responsible for providing it. The fact that a third party provides the service means that the concessionaire replaces the authority granting the concession in respect of its obligations to ensure that the service is provided for the community. Another characteristic feature of concessions is the remuneration of the concessionaire, which derives wholly or in part from the provision of the service to the beneficiary. This is connected with another important feature of service concessions in the Community context, namely that the concessionaire automatically assumes the economic risk associated with the provision and management of the services that are the subject of the concession.

Those criteria, partly borrowed from the sphere of build-and-manage concessions or to be precise from the Directive on public works contracts, (13) were also mentioned by the Court in its judgment in Case C-272/91 concerning the concession for the lottery computerisation system. (14)

27 Although, as I have just remarked, the definition of the term `contract' is somewhat defective in respect of the subject of the contract and the purpose of the service, (15) the subject of the contract can nevertheless be identified, purely by deduction, as the activity of providing a service for consideration. On the other hand, the definition the legislature gives in the Directive lays considerable emphasis on the nature of the consideration as an aspect of the legal relationship. Therefore, by virtue of the term used by the Community legislature (`for pecuniary interest'), it must in any event take a pecuniary form: the pretium.

28 I shall now consider whether those conditions are fulfilled in the present case. The relationship between the municipalities and ARA is characterised by the fact that ARA is under an obligation to provide certain services. The first point to be settled is the identity of the beneficiaries of those services. In that connection, the Gerechtshof te Arnhem mentions the municipalities' decisions to transfer to ARA the activities in question, which they had previously performed, and the contracts concluded between the municipalities and ARA as a result. It is clear from the details given that the beneficiaries of the refuse collection and disposal services, provided initially by the municipalities and subsequently by ARA, remained the same. They continued to be, as they had been in the past, the private individuals and firms living and working within the two municipal districts.

While these considerations as to the identity of the potential beneficiaries of the service in question are not, on the basis of the criteria specified earlier, sufficient to allow it to be determined whether the relationship between the municipalities and ARA can be described as a contract, they do nevertheless cast light on some aspects in which that relationship differs from a genuine service contract.

29 I should also mention in this connection the opinion expressed by the French Government that the relationship in question should, on the contrary, be classified as a service concession.

As we know, if that view were to be upheld, the system established by the Directive could not apply to the dealings between the municipalities and ARA in any case. Having regard to the French Government's viewpoint, the Court asked the parties to define the precise terms of the relationship in question.

30 The United Kingdom Government, in particular, stated its position on this aspect of the case, to the effect that the relationship between the municipalities and ARA cannot be regarded as a contract. In the UK Government's view, that relationship amounts on the contrary to a service concession because a public authority has delegated to a distinct legal entity the performance of certain functions which the authority granting the concession originally performed itself. According to the UK Government, this is one way among many in which the authority may arrange and organise its administrative functions. The relationship between the authority granting the concession and the concessionaire therefore falls outside the normal scope of contracts as such because it is essentially an administrative relationship not a contractual relationship.

31 Incidentally, it should also be noted in this connection that, according to the Gerechtshof te Arnhem, the question whether the relationship is in the nature of a concession is bound up with the procedural question of the stage reached in the proceedings pending before that court. The Gerechtshof te Arnhem states in the order for reference that the question whether the relationship at issue was in the nature of a concession had been decided by the court of first instance, which had held that it was not. That decision was not contested on appeal and the point now under consideration could not therefore be amended by the Gerechtshof te Arnhem, even if the Court itself were to rule against the judgment delivered by the court of first instance.

It is claimed that that view, maintained by BFI Holding and partly adopted by the Commission, (16) is also supported by recent judgments of the Court, notably in Van Schijndel. (17) The Court held on that occasion that `Community law does not require national courts to raise of their own motion an issue concerning the breach of provisions of Community law where examination of that issue would oblige them to abandon the passive role assigned to them by going beyond the ambit of the dispute defined by the parties themselves and relying on facts and circumstances other than those on which the party with an interest in application of those provisions bases his claim.'

In short, according to BFI, in view of the procedural situation described by the Gerechtshof te Arnhem, that court would be unable to make use of the ruling given by the Court of Justice if the latter were to rule that the relationship in question is in the nature of a concession. The Gerechtshof te Arnhem would be precluded from modifying the uncontested part of the judgment, to the effect that the relationship in question is not in the nature of a concession, as that issue has already been decided and is res judicata.

32 I am not, however, convinced by the defendant's arguments in that connection. The Court is required to give a full interpretation of Community provisions, placing them in their legislative context and explaining their connection with the actual situation to which they refer or to which they are to apply. To give an interpretation out of context would be extremely difficult because of its abstract nature and could also mislead the court that had requested it, in that such an interpretation might not take due account of the particular problem to be solved. This view of the matter is supported by a substantial number of judgments delivered by the Court, declaring questions referred by national courts for preliminary ruling to be inadmissible in the absence of an exhaustive statement of the relevant facts and national provisions. (18) Of course, compliance with national rules of procedure sets a limit, which is to some extent inviolable and which the national court and the Community court are required to respect. That point was fully recognised and accepted as a matter of law by the Court in its judgment in Van Schijndel, cited above. However, that does not mean that the Court is released from its initial obligation to characterise the legal relationship to which the rules it has been asked to interpret are subsequently to apply. That obligation must, in my view, be fulfilled irrespective of whether the Court subsequently concludes that the rules at issue have no bearing on the case. Indeed, if the national court appeared to have committed an error in judicando for which there was no longer any judicial remedy, the Court's role would be precisely to state the limits to which interpretation of the rule in question was subject and to point out, if necessary, that the problem raised by the national court had no bearing, from the point of view of Community law, on the facts of the case. (19)

33 However, it seems to me that the situation in the present case is very different from the one I have just been considering. The problem raised by the defendant is not the same. To my way of thinking, the court of first instance was in fact right about the nature of the relationship at issue when it ruled that it was not a service concession. I have come to the same conclusion despite the fact that the municipalities and ARA frequently employed those terms in their decisions, in the statutes of ARA and in the contracts giving effect to their relationship.$

The key factor, which would allow the relationship at issue to be classified as a concession and which is missing in this case, is the assumption of the risk associated with the management of the service. It is absolutely and undeniably clear from the documents before the Court that the remuneration for the work done by ARA was not `fixed in abstract terms'. (20) Those documents in fact provide for payment of a consideration but the actual amount to be paid is not a function of certain factors decided in advance, such as the unit cost of each operation, nor is it a flat-rate payment. In either of the latter hypotheses, the economic responsibility for the management of the service would rest with the body providing the service. But in this case, on the contrary, the consideration paid for the work performed by ARA is a direct function of the total cost incurred by that company in providing the service required of it. It appears from the documents before the Court that that consideration is paid on the basis of regular statements of account designed simply to show the total income and expenditure associated with the management of the service and thus enable the municipalities to balance ARA's budget. Nor do the rates paid by the community for the services rendered give any indication of the criterion on the basis of which ARA's operations are paid for: the rates are altered as and when necessary to achieve a substantial balance between income and expenditure having due regard also to the important requirement that the service provided must not cost the beneficiaries too much.

In my opinion, the situation I have just described precludes the relationship at issue in this case from being qualified as a service concession within the meaning of Community law. However, that does not necessarily mean that it can be qualified as a service contract.

34 As I have already explained, the definition of that concept contained in the Directive turns on the fact that the relevant services are performed for pecuniary interest. For the relationship to be defined as a contract, the consideration to which the contractor is entitled must therefore be decided in advance and in abstract terms. The Court, as we have seen, clearly described this defining characteristic of contracts in its judgment in Case C-272/91, Commission v Italy, cited above. (21)

In the present case, as I have said, the consideration to be paid for the services was not in the Court's phrase `fixed in abstract terms' (22) by the municipalities, precisely because, as I have explained, their financial dealings with ARA are determined by the particular needs that arise from time to time in the course of its activities. In the present case, there is consequently no actual or potential set `price' that could be used as a reference. Nor is there any element of profit in the remuneration received by ARA. What is involved here is therefore remuneration for the service in question based solely on an economic approach to management, without any element of risk. These characteristics mean that, in view of the manner in which they are paid for, the tasks performed by ARA cannot be classified as activities of an industrial or commercial character and cannot therefore be the subject of a genuine call for tenders.

35 But that is not all. If we look at the financial arrangements on which the relationship between the municipalities and ARA is based, the key economic factor in the relationship is the municipalities' own budget. ARA's economic survival essentially depends not on the volume of its refuse collection and disposal operations or the efficiency with which it manages them but is based solely on the municipalities' willingness to provide it with the necessary resources by transferring funds from their budgets and setting acceptable rates for the services it provides. In short, the terms in the contract that concern ARA's remuneration are based on an `entirely potestative' condition whereby the municipalities have absolute authority to decide whether funds are to be transferred to ARA and in what amount, thus exercising an effective power of life and death over that body.

36 As regards the connection between the municipalities and ARA, it is therefore clear that the relationship between them arose from the need to merge municipal refuse collection and disposal services in order to deal with a demand which, in terms of scale and quality, the existing structures of the two municipalities could no longer handle on their own.

The intention in establishing ARA and entrusting it with the tasks previously performed by the municipalities was thus to consolidate the services in question, not to transfer them to an outside body and so remove them from the ambit of municipal responsibility. The solution adopted by the municipalities, namely to combine their respective refuse collection and disposal services and entrust them to the entity they had agreed to establish, is also reflected in the structure of the company established for that purpose. The two municipalities are the sole shareholders of ARA. Consequently, despite the fact that it was established as a company with share capital, ARA is not in my opinion essentially separate from the municipalities' administrative structure. The form of the company is such that it may be regarded as an organ (23) of the public authority, albeit in a broad and indirect sense. (24) This view is clearly confirmed by all that I have just said about the characteristics of ARA, the manner in which it is remunerated and the fact that it is completely dependent on the municipalities, as regards not only its economic resources but also the membership of its governing body (a majority, at least, of the members of its supervisory board are municipal nominees).

37 The question of a public authority's freedom to organise itself in the way best suited to meet the community's requirements need not, I think, detain us. The organisational arrangements chosen by a public authority must not allow the application of provisions designed to govern the quite different and well-defined situation in which a private individual provides a service for a public authority in return for remuneration. This is clear from the wording of the Directive. The Community legislature not only refused to allow forms of administrative organisation such as the one at issue in this case and other similar or comparable forms of organisation such as concessions to be included in the scope of the Directive: it also took the further step of exempting even genuine contracts concluded between two contracting authorities from the obligation to follow the procedures laid down in the Directive.

38 To sum up, I consider that there is no `third party' element, that is to say no essential distinction between ARA and the two municipalities, in the present case. What is involved here is a form of inter-departmental delegation that remains within the administrative ambit of the municipalities. In assigning the activities in question to ARA, the municipalities had absolutely no intention of privatising the functions they themselves had previously performed in this sector. In short, I take the view that the relationship between the municipalities and ARA cannot be regarded as a contract within the meaning of the Directive.

B - Persons covered by the Directive

39 It automatically follows from that conclusion that the Directive does not apply to the relationship between the municipalities and ARA. To complete my examination of the case referred to the Court, I shall now consider whether ARA can be included among the persons required to comply with the Directive.

In the light of what has already been said, it now falls to be determined in particular which of the categories mentioned in the Directive as contracting authorities for the purposes of the Directive might include the body in question.

40 The French Government has argued that ARA is not so much a public body as simply an association between municipalities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the Directive. This view is based on the fact, mentioned above, that the municipalities are the only two shareholders of ARA.

The French Government's opinion must be accorded due consideration. In particular, it must be considered in this connection whether, for the purposes of the definition of `contracting authority' referred to in Article 1 of the Directive, the terms `body governed by public law' and `association' refer to two separate and mutually exclusive concepts or whether on the contrary the Directive may include in that definition entities that fall into both categories at once.

The answer to that question is, in my view, that the abovementioned categories cannot overlap. The Community legislature intended the rules on contracts to apply also to those forms of public association that give rise to entities which, even if not possessing legal personality of their own, are nevertheless quite clearly among the forms of public authority cooperation or organisation falling within the ambit of the Directive. I refer, for example, precisely to forms of association such as groups of local authorities or similar kinds of group, which, although lacking legal personality, nevertheless perform tasks of a public nature and to which the Community legislature intended the Directive to apply for typically functional reasons. I should add that, to be included in that category, such entities must also in my view be non-profit-making.

41 According to that approach, the category comprising associations has a residual function. In other words, it covers all those forms of public cooperation which, as I have said, give rise to entities that have no legal personality but are also not local authorities and cannot be regarded as bodies governed by public law.

The conclusion I have reached presupposes that the Community legislature intended the concept of a contracting authority to have a very broad meaning, including all the various embodiments through which the public authorities might exercise their powers. Nor do I think they could possibly have used meaningless or misleadingly overlapping concepts that could give rise to difficulties of interpretation in classifying the entities required to comply with the Directive.

This view is lent considerable weight by the judgment in Beentjes, (25) in which the Court held that, for the purposes of the public works directive, a body which has no legal personality of its own but depends in many respects on the public authorities `must be regarded as falling within the notion of the State... even though it is not part of the State administration in formal terms'. It should be noted however that the Community provision that was being interpreted in that case was Article 1 of Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts. (26) The interpretation was therefore concerned with the Community definition in the Directive of the measures taken by `contracting authorities', which at that time did not yet include `associations', a category inserted later in the amended versions of the `contracts directives.' I also think the Court wished to fill a gap in the legislation by bringing within the personal scope of the Directive, to quote Advocate General Darmon, `organs outside the traditional structures of the administration which have no legal personality of their own but carry out functions which normally fall within the competence of the State or local authorities'.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

In amending and reformulating the concept of contracting authority, the Community legislature specifically decided to include associations, on the one hand, and bodies governed by public law, on the other. Thus, it expressly brought within the ambit of the `public contracts' directives not only bodies with no legal personality of their own, often forms of association between public authorities of various kinds whose characteristics and legal nature are hard to define a priori, but also bodies governed by public law which on the contrary are specifically required to have their own legal personality. The fact that ARA has its own legal personality therefore means that it cannot be classified as an `association.'

42 As regards the concept of `needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character', the answer to be given to the national court cannot in my view leave the particular features of each individual situation out of account. Thus, in the present case, I do not think the Court can establish general criteria for interpreting the provision at issue that do not take this particular case into account. We have here a provision that does not really lend itself to general and abstract interpretation precisely because, as I mentioned earlier, the Community legislature intended it to have a distinctly functional character. This principle of interpretation was stated, adopted and applied by the Court, first in its judgment in Beentjes (27) and more recently in Mannesmann. (28) I believe I should abide by that criterion in the present case too.

43 However, the concept in question should certainly be interpreted in the light of the earlier case-law of the Court, (29) which has attached considerable importance to the absence of risk which must be a feature of the management of the activities of the body in question if it is to be included among the public authorities covered by the Directive. This interpretation may perhaps place more emphasis on the commercial or industrial character of the activity than on the fact that it must meet needs in the general interest. The latter is a concept that varies appreciably from one Member State to another and also depends on the historical context in which it is considered. Needs in the general interest, once identified, have in their turn a commercial or industrial character closely connected with the way in which the State is organised. The commercial or industrial connotation of such needs differs considerably, for example, depending on the priority accorded at national level to privatisation of the public services designed to meet those needs. Moreover, the Directive was not intended to cover uniform Community-wide categories. Remember that it confines itself to coordinating - not harmonising - the various national provisions relating to contracts. I do not think, therefore, that the Directive established a Community category by means of the definition in question. It was simply referring to the provisions on the subject contained in the legislation of the Member States.

44 Within the framework I have described, it is very difficult - if not impossible - to define the needs that are relevant for the purposes of the Directive. For the purposes of interpretation, therefore, the only general criterion that can properly apply in this area is the link between the satisfaction of the needs and the structure of the State (understood in the broad sense, of course) and especially the factor of economic dependence on the State.

A clear sign of dependence on the State sector is precisely that the absence of any risk associated with the activities the body in question is required to perform. If, on the other hand, the activities of such a body involve even a remote prospect of profit or if the management of the activities is based on principles of economy and financial autonomy, then in my view the activities fall outside the framework I have described and there will be no reason to include the body in question among the bodies covered by the Directive. I should just like to say that this interpretation of the provisions at issue is also fully in line with the Court's judgments on the subject of public undertakings (30) and with the relevant Community legislation. (31)

I therefore take the view that the concept of a body governed by public law within the meaning of the Directive includes bodies that meet general needs `independently of the rules of normal commercial management', (32) so long as the other requirements of the definition are also met.

45 In the light of what I have said, the problem of whether or not ARA is to be regarded as a body governed by public law now appears to have been settled. There is no doubt that the functions that body was established to fulfil (33) and does fulfil institutionally, together with the manner in which it performs its tasks, are among those defined in the Directive as meeting `needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character.'

46 It should also be pointed out, incidentally, that it is irrelevant for the purposes of the present case that, as the order for reference mentions in passing, ARA - directly or through a company entirely owned by it - not only performs the tasks entrusted to it by the municipalities but also provides similar services for third parties in return for appropriate remuneration. In my opinion, those activities, which, it appears, account for a small proportion of all the functions that body performs (34) and, from an economic point of view, have no appreciable effect on its financial structure, are not, however, such as to cause me to alter the conclusion I reached earlier. Moreover, the Court has already ruled on this point in its recent judgment in Mannesmann, (35) in which it recognised that the fact that a body performs other activities in addition to the main activity it was established to perform is not in itself such as to change the nature of the body in question for the purposes of applying the public contracts directives. From an economic and financial point of view, the existence of ARA effectively depends, as we have seen, on the contribution the municipalities make to its budget. This completely rules out the possibility that any other activity it performs might actually be run on specifically commercial lines: the municipalities' financial contribution radically alters the element that forms the basis of all commercial relationships, namely the endeavour to achieve the best and most effective ratio between costs and remuneration. The fact that in any event the body succeeds in balancing its books as a result of the assistance it receives from the municipalities, and that there is consequently no element of risk, means that its activities cannot be regarded as being competitive in any real sense.

The service provided by ARA meets a public need that has to be met, namely the collection and treatment of refuse. That task is not performed for profit and is not part of a system in which the rules of the market apply. Both the conditions the Community legislature laid down in the first part of the definition of a body governed by public law are therefore fully satisfied: namely that it must be established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest and that those needs must not have a commercial or industrial character.

Conclusion

In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court give the following answers to the questions referred to it by the Gerechtshof te Arnhem:

(1) The relationship between two municipalities and a body established by them, to which they have entrusted the refuse collection and treatment service within their areas and whose remuneration comes inter alia from the municipal budget, ensuring that in any event that body's activities remain financially balanced, does not constitute a service contract within the meaning of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts;

(2) An entity of the type described above is also a body governed by public law within the meaning of Directive 92/50/EEC.

for the purpose was also based on the study commissioned by the municipalities from a firm of consultants. The consultants made a number of suggestions, which the municipalities accepted and put into effect.

(3) - The obligation under Article 9 in conjunction with Article 16, to publish a notice of the results of the award procedure after the award has been made, does not apply in the case of the services listed in Annex I B, where publication is purely optional. (33) - The expression `established for the specific purpose of meeting needs etc...' in the definition given in the Directive must of course be interpreted in the light of changing circumstances. The aims originally set out in the body's instrument of incorporation must be compared with the present situation and the aims it is actually pursuing, as stated, for example, in the objects of the company in the case of bodies incorporated as companies.

(34) - It appears from the documents before the Court that ARA's turnover for 1995 was NLG 39 392 000, comprising NLG 32 791 000 for the collection and disposal of household refuse and NLG 6 601 000 for the collection and disposal of industrial waste.

(35) - Judgment in Case C-44/96 Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others v Strohal Rotationsdruck, cited above. In that judgment, the Court held that in any case the activity performed by the Austrian body in addition to its principal activity was covered by the public works directive. The Court came to that conclusion by distinguishing between institutional activities that are specifically intended to meet needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and activities that do not meet those criteria. However, the answer given by the Court, which I think was essentially correct in the conclusion it reached, needs some amplification. In fact, I must observe in this connection that, to my mind, it is impossible to distinguish between activities that do not have an industrial or commercial character and those that do, when the body in question is one of those classified as contracting authorities within the meaning of the public works or public services directive. The absence of risk that is characteristic of the way in which the body in question operates means that any activity it performs, even if it may in theory be a profit-making activity, is ultimately indistinguishable in financial terms from its institutional activity, which consequently absorbs other activities and radically alters their commercial or industrial character.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 16 July 1998.
Commission of the European Communities v Ireland.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations - Public supply contracts - Review procedures - Definition of contracting authority.
Case C-353/96.

A - Introduction

1 In the present Treaty-infringement proceedings brought against Ireland, the Commission claims that a call by the Irish Forestry Board (Coillte Teoranta) for tenders for the supply of fertiliser was not published in the Official Journal of the European Communities. The essential issue in this regard is whether Coillte Teoranta is a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 77/62 (1) and therefore under an obligation to publish a notice of the call for tenders in question.

2 On 10 March 1994 Coillte Teoranta issued a call for tenders in respect of a contract to supply fertiliser but did not publish a corresponding notice in the Official Journal of the European Communities. The matter was brought to the Commission's attention on 18 May 1994. A contract for the supply of fertiliser, to the value of approximately IR £280 000, was concluded pursuant to the tendering procedure on 30 May 1994. On 21 June 1994, an undertaking which had unsuccessfully tendered brought proceedings before the Irish High Court challenging the failure to publish a notice of the call for tenders. (2)

3 The Commission sent a letter to the Irish Government on 30 June 1994 highlighting the failure to publish a notice of the call for tenders. That letter was based on Article 3(1) of Directive 89/665/EEC (3) and was also expressly stated to constitute a letter of formal notice within the meaning of Article 169 of the EC Treaty. A letter of the same tenor was sent to Coillte Teoranta. In its reply, the Irish Government challenged the view taken by the Commission. The Commission subsequently sent a reasoned opinion to the Irish Government on 23 February 1996. The Irish Government, however, took issue with the complaints raised, in part on the ground that the procedure under Article 169 of the EC Treaty was not applicable to the present case because national judicial proceedings were already pending and Coillte Teoranta was in any event not a contracting authority, with the result that publication in the Official Journal would have been unnecessary.

4 The Commission claims that the Court should:

- declare that, in failing to comply with the provisions of Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, as amended by Directive 88/295/EEC, and, in particular, in failing to publish its call for tender for the supply of fertilisers on behalf of the Irish Forestry Board (Coillte Teoranta) in the Official Journal of the European Communities, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations under the Treaty;

- order Ireland to pay the costs.

5 Ireland contends that the Court should:

- dismiss the application;

- order the Commission to pay the costs.

B - Relevant legal provisions

Community law

6 Article 1 of Directive 77/62 defines a contracting authority as follows:

`For the purpose of this Directive:

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

...

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities and the legal persons governed by public law or, in Member States where the latter are unknown, bodies corresponding thereto as specified in Annex I;

...'

7 Annex I to Directive 77/62, as amended by Directive 88/295, contains a list of the legal persons governed by public law and bodies corresponding thereto referred to in Article 1(b). Point VI refers to these as being, in the case of Ireland:

`other public authorities whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State'.

8 Directive 77/62 was repealed by Directive 93/36. (4) This new directive required to be transposed in national law by 14 June 1994, something which did not happen in Ireland. It should once again be remembered that the supply contract had already been concluded on 30 May 1994.

9 The concept of a contracting authority is henceforth defined as follows in Article 1:

`For the purpose of this Directive:

...

(b) "contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law;

"a body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law;

...'

10 So far as review of compliance with the provisions for awarding contracts is concerned, the Commission is empowered under Article 3 of Directive 89/665 to:

`invoke the procedure for which this Article provides when, prior to a contract being concluded, it considers that a clear and manifest infringement of Community provisions in the field of public procurement has been committed during a contract award procedure falling within the scope of... [Directive 77/62]'.

This procedure is regulated by Article 3(2), which provides that the Commission `... shall notify the Member State and the contracting authority concerned of the reasons which have led it to conclude that a clear and manifest infringement has been committed and request its correction'.

As grounds for not correcting an infringement, Article 3(4) provides that reliance may be placed `among other matters on the fact that the alleged infringement is already the subject of judicial or other review proceedings...'.

National provisions

11 The provisions of Community law were transposed in national law by the following:

- Directive 77/62 was transposed by the European Communities (Award of Public Supply Contracts) Regulations 1992 (SI No 37 of 1992);

- Directive 89/665 was transposed by the European Communities (Review Procedures for the Award of Public Supply and Public Works Contracts) Regulations 1992 (SI No 38 of 1992); and

- Directive 93/36 was transposed by the European Communities (Award of Public Supply Contracts) (Amendment) Regulations 1994 (SI No 292 of 1994).

12 The relations between the Department of Agriculture, Food and Forestry, the Department of Finance and the shareholders of Coillte Teoranta are defined by the Forestry Act 1988 and by the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the company itself. It will be necessary to return to the individual provisions of those rules for purposes of clarity when examining whether the action is well founded.

C - Analysis

Admissibility

13 The Irish Government first submits that infringement proceedings under Article 169 of the EC Treaty are not the correct form of action in this case. The Commission ought, it claims, to have used the procedure set out in Article 3 of Directive 89/665. (5) By reason of the action brought before the Irish High Court, the alleged infringement is already the subject of judicial or other review proceedings. The Commission was also notified of those proceedings; to that extent, it is bound by the procedure under Article 3 of Directive 89/665 and cannot bring any action under Article 169 of the EC Treaty.

14 Under Article 3(1) of Directive 89/665, (6) the procedure for which that article provides can be applied only if the Commission is satisfied that there has been a clear and unequivocal infringement of Directive 77/62 before the contract has been concluded.

15 The Commission points out that it did not send its letter of formal notice to the Irish Government until 30 June 1994, whereas the contract in question had already been concluded on 30 May 1994.

16 In regard to the temporal aspects, the Court held in Commission v Netherlands (7) that it is clear from the letter and spirit of Directive 89/665 that it is very much to be preferred, in the interest of all parties concerned, that the Commission should give notice of its objections to the Member State and the contracting authority as soon as possible before the contract is concluded, thereby giving the Member State and the contracting authority time to answer the complaint and if necessary to correct the alleged infringement before the contract is awarded.

17 In the present case, however, the Commission did not send its letter of formal notice to Ireland and Coillte Teoranta until one month after the contract for the supply of fertiliser had been concluded. The procedure under Article 3 of Directive 89/665 can therefore no longer be applicable.

18 It should also be noted that the special procedure under Directive 89/665 is a preliminary measure which can neither derogate from nor replace the Commission's powers under Article 169 of the Treaty. That article gives the Commission discretionary power to bring an action before the Court where it considers that a Member State has failed to fulfil one of its obligations under the Treaty and has not complied with the Commission's reasoned opinion. (8)

19 The Commission's action brought under Article 169 of the EC Treaty is therefore admissible.

The question whether the action is well founded

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

20 The question first arises as to which provisions of Community law are applicable.

21 It is common ground that Directive 77/62, as amended by Directive 88/295, is relevant. In the Irish Government's view, however, Directive 93/36 or its underlying premisses should also be enlisted for the purpose of assessing the case.

22 It should, however, be pointed out that Directive 93/36 did not require to be transposed until 14 June 1994 and that Ireland had not yet done so by 22 July 1994. (9) The events of which the Commission complains occurred in May 1994 and thus at a time when Directive 93/36 had not yet been transposed in Irish law and also did not yet require to be so transposed. Directive 93/36 cannot therefore be directly applicable.

23 It is also extremely doubtful to what extent the directive which is later in time can be used for the purpose of interpreting the earlier directive. The Irish Government, which submits that the Court should proceed in such a manner, relies in this connection on the recitals in the preamble to Directive 93/36, according to which that directive was adopted primarily for reasons of clarity. Consequently, it claims, there should be no problem in construing the earlier provisions in the light of the new version.

24 It must first be noted in this regard that the wording of the definition of a contracting authority in Directive 93/36 has been substantially extended and now contains individual features which were nowhere mentioned in the earlier version. To that extent, the new version might well indeed lead to a restriction in the directive's scope; the Commission also made a reference in this connection during the oral procedure.

25 Second, the first recital in the preamble to Directive 93/36 does admittedly mention that a new version is required for reasons of clarity. However, this was also because amendments were to be made. (10) Likewise, it was intended to achieve an alignment with the provisions on the award of contracts for public works and service contracts. (11) According to the third recital, however, this alignment relates also to the introduction of a functional definition of contracting authorities. On an a contrario reading, however, this means that the definition now given need not necessarily be identical with that which previously applied, and extreme caution should therefore be exercised in using it as an aid to interpretation. The new directive, which has also repealed and replaced Annex I to the old version, contains in its definition of a contracting authority additional matters which do not merely amplify the previous definition or general thinking on the topic, but also constitute modifications which go further and cannot be applied retroactively. Furthermore, in interpreting a provision of Community law it is always necessary to consider its wording, its context and its aims. (12) For the present case, therefore, it follows that the facts fall to be assessed on the basis of Directive 77/62.

26 In the Commission's view, Coillte Teoranta is a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 77/62, with the result that notice of supply contracts requires to be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities pursuant to Article 9 of the directive, something which was, however, not done in this case.

27 In support of its contention, the Commission submits that Coillte Teoranta fulfils important public functions, such as the conservation of national forests and the support of forestry development in Ireland. Coillte Teoranta owns 12 national parks and provides leisure facilities at more than 180 locations throughout Ireland. In order to meet those objectives, the company was established by statute and financially provided for by the Irish Government. It also follows from the Memorandum and Articles of Association that the Government appoints the Board and its Chairman and that the company's finances are controlled by the Government.

28 The Irish Government counters by arguing that Coillte Teoranta is simply a State-owned private undertaking. Although the State has a majority shareholding, it does not exercise any influence over the day-to-day running of the company. Coillte Teoranta is required under the Forestry Act to carry out its business in a commercial manner. State influence is limited to general commercial policy, in the same way as any majority shareholder in any other company. The objectives and tasks of the company, however, are exclusively commercial in nature. Coillte Teoranta is thus in competition with other undertakings and is in no different position whatever compared with those other undertakings. If Coillte Teoranta makes its facilities and property available to the public for leisure and recreational purposes, this is done on commercial grounds, since the benefit derived from these activities exceeds the costs. In short, neither Coillte Teoranta itself nor the conclusion by Coillte Teoranta of contracts with other undertakings is subject to influence by the State in excess of that which majority shareholders in other companies would be recognised as having.

29 As already mentioned, the State, regional or local authorities, and - in the case of Ireland - other public authorities under Point VI of Annex I whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State constitute contracting authorities for the purposes of Article 1(b) of Directive 77/62.

30 With regard to the present case, this means that it is first necessary to consider whether Coillte Teoranta can be subsumed within the concept of the `State'.

31 In connection with such an examination, the Court was called on in the Beentjes case (13) to determine the status of a body which did not have any separate legal personality, the functions and composition of which were regulated by statute and whose members were appointed by a committee of the Province in question. It was required to apply rules laid down by a central committee established by a State decree and the members of which were appointed by the Government. The State ensured compliance with the obligations arising from the body's legal transactions and financed the public works contracts which it awarded.

32 The provisions applicable at that time were contained in Directive 71/305; (14) however, the definition of a contracting authority contained therein corresponds to that in Directive 77/62.

33 In Beentjes, the Court concluded that the concept of the State, as used in the directive, fell to be interpreted in functional terms. (15) The aim of the directive was, for the Court, to ensure `... the effective attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in respect of public works contracts...'. (16) The Court accordingly concluded that the body at issue in that case had to be regarded as falling within the notion of the State, since its composition and functions were laid down by legislation and it was dependent on the authorities for the appointment of its members, the observance of the obligations arising out of its measures and the financing of the public works contracts which it was its task to award. That, the Court ruled, was the case even though the body was not part of the State administration in formal terms. (17)

34 A similar approach should be adopted in the present case. The objective of the directive which is here relevant does not differ in any essential respects from that at issue in Beentjes. According to the first and second recitals in its preamble, Directive 77/62 is designed to ensure better supervision of the prohibition of restrictions on the free movement of goods in regard to public supply contracts. In addition, the directive - according to the 12th recital in its preamble - set itself the task of developing effective competition in the field of public contracts. In order, however, to guarantee competition free from any discrimination, those to whom the directive is addressed - namely, the contracting authorities - must be determined on the basis of a functional and not exclusively formal approach.

35 In functional terms, Coillte Teoranta cannot be regarded as part of the State. Admittedly, the company was established by statute and provided with financial means by public authorities, it must consult with the Minister for Finance in regard to issues of forestry development in areas of economic interest, its directors are Government appointees, and the annual plan for the sale of land and timber must be agreed with the Government.

36 Coillte Teoranta does, however, have separate legal personality. The public contracts which it awards are financed out of the company's capital, which, although originally provided by the Government, has in the meantime also been guaranteed through private commercial activities. No public contracts are awarded at the expense of the State. All things considered, State influence on the business activities of Coillte Teoranta must be regarded as being appreciably less than was the case with regard to the facts underlying Beentjes. The functional approach thus does not point to the company's being dependent on the State in such a way as to justify the conclusion that it constitutes part of the State.

37 Once it is held that Coillte Teoranta, in accordance with the view here expressed, cannot be subsumed within the notion of the State under Article 1(b) of Directive 77/62, it remains to be examined whether it may be a public authority whose public supply contracts are subject to control by the State within the meaning of Annex I. The decisive factor in this, apart from the fact of looking after public interests, is the degree of influence which the State may exercise on the award of public contracts.

38 The Commission takes a similar viewpoint to that on the question just discussed. It argues that, particularly in view of the fact that the company was established by statute, that its Board is appointed by the Government, and its initial capital was provided by the State, which continues to control its finances, Coillte Teoranta is an authority whose public contracts are controlled by the State.

39 Against this, the Irish Government points again to the commercial character of the company, which finds itself in competition with other private undertakings on the market in question. It does not enjoy any preferential rights such as would give it an advantageous position in relation to others. State influence is limited to that which other shareholders are recognised, or may be recognised, as having. From the legal point of view, the State has no possibility of influencing day-to-day business, nor has it ever attempted to exercise such influence. Coillte Teoranta is treated under company law in the same way as any other company. Its activities are directed at making profits and are independent of ministerial instruction.

40 The crucial question is therefore the following: were the public supply contracts which Coillte Teoranta awarded subject to control by the State, in the terms used for Ireland by Annex I to Directive 77/62?

41 Here, too, an approach should be adopted which does not consider the matter merely from the formal aspect. All public undertakings are subject to some form of State control; that, however, is not tantamount to their also being contracting authorities within the meaning of the directive.

42 The concept of public undertakings is to be found in Article 90(1) of the EC Treaty. That provision prohibits Member States from enacting or maintaining in force, in relation to such undertakings, measures that are contrary to Community competition policy. The characteristic feature of public undertakings is that public authorities can influence the conduct of their business. For that purpose, it suffices if there is a possibility of influence being exerted, and this possibility will always exist if the State holds the greater part of the company capital. (18)

43 Its status as a public undertaking, however, still provides no indication as to whether the public supply contracts which Coillte Teoranta awards are subject to control by the State. Since Annex I to Directive 77/62 refers expressly to State control over public supply contracts, this point requires to be considered in concrete terms. (19) Accordingly, the supply contract in question would, under the relevant provisions, have to be open to State control in such a way that public authorities are able to exert influence on the manner in which the contract is concluded.

44 The State initially provided Coillte Teoranta with its entire company capital. In return, the State received corresponding shares in the company. The annual land and timber sale plan must be agreed with the Department. The company directors are appointed by the competent ministers; investments exceeding a total amount of IR £250 000 require the approval and consent of the competent ministers. The Minister for Energy can set out financial objectives. The company also carries out functions in the public interest, such as the provision of leisure, recreation, sporting, educational, scientific, cultural and holiday facilities on its property. The Board of Directors looks after the day-to-day business of the company, which includes decisions on awarding contracts.

45 There is, however, no provision under which it would be possible for the Minister or for any civil servant to instruct the company or its directors to award contracts (possibly on the basis of non-commercial criteria). The company is under an obligation to carry out its business in a cost-effective and economic manner. Its directors are under an obligation to exercise their powers, in accordance with their duty of loyalty to the company, in a manner independent of their own interests. Although the company is required to abide by the principles of national forestry policy, this applies equally to every owner of forest land in Ireland. The directors must submit annually a five-year development plan, indicating in detail the plans regarding management and development of the company and its assets, as well as acquisition and sale of property, forestry objectives and profit forecasts. Here too, the relevant provisions do not grant any powers to the State authorities to intervene for the purpose of regulating the company's day-to-day activities.

46 Therefore, although the criteria mentioned make it possible to point to a general State influence on the company, that influence does not, under the provisions material to the present case, suffice to exercise specific control over the award of public supply contracts. The conclusion of contracts relating to public supplies is not dependent on the action of State authorities. Coillte Teoranta is for that reason not a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 77/62.

47 It follows from the foregoing considerations that Coillte Teoranta does not come within the scope of Directive 77/62 and that the action alleging failure to fulfil Treaty obligations is therefore unfounded.

48 Even though Directive 93/36 is not applicable to the present case, given that the contracts were concluded before that directive entered into force, and since that directive also modifies and does not simply clarify, the following may, in the alternative, be pointed out in light of the parties' extensive submissions. In view of the definition of a contracting authority in Article 1(b), as extended by amendments, it would be necessary to examine whether Coillte Teoranta is a body governed by public law. It would first have to have been established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial nature. This would probably have to be answered in the affirmative, since Coillte Teoranta also - or predominantly - has the function of providing leisure and recreational facilities for the public on its property. Even though these do not represent the company's only functions, this does not affect the outcome, so long as it attends to needs which it is specifically required to meet. (20) In addition, Coillte Teoranta has its own legal personality. If the company's Board consists in the majority of State appointees, Coillte Teoranta may well be a contracting authority within the meaning of the new Directive 93/36. As stated above, however, that directive is not applicable to the present case.

D - Costs

49 Under the first subparagraph of Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings.

Since the Commission has been unsuccessful under the solution here proposed, it should be ordered to pay the costs.

E - Conclusion

50 In light of the above considerations, I propose that the Court should:

(1) dismiss the action;

(2) order the Commission to pay the costs of the proceedings.

(1) - Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1), as amended by Directive 88/295/EEC (OJ 1988 L 127, p. 1).

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Fennelly delivered on 23 October 1997.
Commission of the European Communities v Federal Republic of Germany.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Directive 93/36/EEC - Failure to transpose within the prescribed period.
Case C-341/96.

1 The present infringement action concerns the alleged (and partially admitted) failure by the Federal Republic of Germany fully to transpose Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (1) (hereinafter `the Directive'), or to inform the Commission of its implementing measures.

I - Pre-litigation proceedings

2 The Directive has as one of its objectives the establishment of an updated text of the much-amended Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (2) (hereinafter `the 1976 Directive'), incorporating a number of drafting changes aimed at improving the clarity of existing provisions. (3) It also introduces a number of substantive changes, regarding the definition of the contracting authority, (4) the imposition of requirements that reasons be given for the rejection of an application or tender and that a written report be drawn up by contracting authorities in respect of each contract awarded, (5) and the rules on participation in and the award of contracts. Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 19 January 1999.
Commission of the European Communities v Republic of Austria.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Public works contracts - Admissibility - Compatibility with Community law of conditions governing invitations to tender - Failure to publish a contract notice in the Official Journal of the European Communities.
Case C-328/96.

A - Introduction

1 The present proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty concern the assessment under Community law of the award of a series of works contracts in connection with a large project to construct government and administrative buildings and a cultural centre forming part of a plan to base the government of the Land of Lower Austria at St Pölten.

2 The following events underlie the proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty. Work on this large project started in 1992 in the case of the administrative centre and in 1994 in the case of the cultural centre. At the beginning of February 1995, a complaint drew the Commission's attention to the invitation to tender for a supply contract in connection with the project, which was published only in the Niederösterreichisches Amtsblatt (Lower Austrian Official Gazette). The Commission considered that the Allgemeine Angebots- und Vertragsbedingungen (General Tendering and Contract Conditions, `AAVB'), on which the invitation to tender was based, were contrary to Community law since they infringed, inter alia, the advertising rules, the obligation to inform unsuccessful tenderers and the rules on specifications, and drew the Austrian Government's attention to those findings by letter of 12 April 1995. Some time later, as a response to that letter, the Commission received notification of a Vergabegesetz (Law on the Award of Contracts) published by the Land of Lower Austria on 31 May 1995, which itself gave cause for objection since it contained an exemption clause for the `St Pölten Land Administrative and Cultural Centre' project (the so-called `Lex St Pölten') and thereby, in practice, excluded the project from the application of the law.

3 All the issues involved were discussed at a bilateral meeting between the Commission and the Austrian authorities on 27 and 28 November 1995. The Commission alleged infringements of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 (1) and Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 (2) and of Article 30 of the EC Treaty. Having been informed of the objections, the Austrian authorities gave an undertaking that the AAVB would be amended, that the exemption clause in the Vergabegesetz would be repealed and that the contracting authority, the Niederösterreichische Landeshauptstadt-Planungsgesellschaft mbH (hereinafter `Nöplan'), would modify its practices relating to the award of contracts.

4 The Commission hoped that, as a result of the discussions, the Austrian authorities would take immediate action by ensuring that

- the award procedures still to be initiated would be carried out correctly,

- the procedures already initiated but not yet concluded by the award of contracts would be corrected, and

- contracts awarded in contravention of Community law but not yet performed would, as far as possible, be cancelled.

5 The Austrian authorities agreed in principle but pointed out that they would require a sufficient transitional period in order to amend the relevant legal provisions (Vergabegesetz and AAVB).

6 The Austrian authorities' willingness to adapt their award practices did not go far enough for the Commission, with the result that, by letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995, it initiated proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty. In that letter of formal notice, the Commission argued that the Austrian authorities had undertaken to intercede with the responsible decision-making bodies in order to ensure compliance with Community law from the end of January 1996 onwards. (3) In the letter of formal notice the Commission stated, inter alia, that it was extending its complaints `specifically to include those lots for which the contract has already been awarded but where the tendering procedure was not in conformity with Community law'. It requested the Republic of Austria `to ensure that Community law is complied with in the contracting procedures still outstanding' and `to suspend the legal effects or prevent the completion of contracts already awarded in contravention of Community law, to defer pending award decisions until such time as compliance with Community law is secured, and to ensure that the Lower Austrian Vergabegesetz and the AAVB are amended without delay'. (4) In the letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995, the Commission laid down a period of one week for the submission of observations.

7 The Austrian Government replied by letter of 22 December 1995. In that letter it stated that, notwithstanding the `scheduling difficulties made known at the bilateral meeting', Nöplan's bodies were `looking into the subject of contract awards' and had decided `that Nöplan must apply the EU directives with immediate effect'. (5) Finally, it is again stressed `that, notwithstanding additional costs and scheduling disruptions, the EC directives must be applied with immediate effect to all invitations to tender'. (6)

8 In its reasoned opinion of 21 February 1996, the Commission pointed out that the contracting authorities of the Land of Lower Austria were `under an obligation resulting directly from the directly applicable Community legislation to comply with the requirements thereof in the absence of transposition in conformity with Community law'. (7) The Commission also considered that the Austrian Government's reply to the letter of formal notice was inadequate. In that reply it could find no acknowledgement of an obligation to act in respect of pending procedures, `since the observations concerning the obligation to advertise... relate only to the future'. The Commission pointed out that it had asked the Austrian Government `to send it a list of the contracts for which an award procedure has already been initiated or will be advertised in the future, and to give it details of the values of those orders'. It stressed: `To date no satisfactory list has been sent'. Finally, it requested the Austrian authorities `to take all appropriate steps to put an end to the infringements described'. (8) For that purpose it prescribed a period of two weeks from notification of the opinion.

9 In the meantime, the Nöplan award committee had decided, at a meeting on 6 February 1996, to suspend all pending procedures and to invite tenders for and award, in conformity with Community law, the contracts still to be awarded. Subsequently, the defects complained of in regard to the Vergabegesetz were remedied and the AAVB were brought into conformity with Community law. Since then, the contracting practices followed have been manifestly in accordance with Community law.

10 Nevertheless, on 3 October 1996, the Commission brought an action for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty, which was registered at the Court on 7 October 1996, seeking a declaration that the Republic of Austria had failed to fulfil its obligations under Community law in awarding contracts, which were concluded before 6 February 1996 but which, on 7 March 1996, that is, at the time of expiry of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion of 21 February 1996, had not yet been performed or could reasonably have been cancelled. In essence, the Commission alleges that the Republic of Austria made no effort to cancel the contracts awarded after the bilateral meeting of 28 November 1995, that is, when it was aware of the problems with respect to Community law.

11 The Republic of Austria puts forward several objections to the admissibility of the action which it also considers to be substantively unfounded.

12 The Commission claims that the Court should:

1. Declare that the Republic of Austria has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directives

93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 (9) and 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 (10) and under Article 30 of the EC Treaty in connection with the construction of a new administrative and cultural centre for the Land of Lower Austria at St Pölten in awarding contracts which were concluded before 6 February 1996 but which, on 7 March 1996, had not yet been performed or could reasonably have been cancelled;

2. Order the Republic of Austria to pay the costs.

13 The Republic of Austria claims that the Court should:

1. Dismiss as inadmissible (if appropriate, as unfounded) the European Commission's action of 7 October 1996 for a declaration that the Republic of Austria has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directives 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 and 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 and under Article 30 of the EC Treaty in connection with the construction of a new administrative and cultural centre for the Land of Lower Austria at St Pölten in awarding contracts, which were concluded before 6 February 1996 but which, on 7 March 1996, had not yet been performed or could reasonably have been cancelled;

2. Order the European Commission to pay the costs.

14 I will come back to the arguments of the parties in the course of the legal assessment.

B - Opinion

I. Admissibility

15 The Austrian Government considers the action inadmissible on a number of grounds.

1. Inadmissibility of the subject-matter of the proceedings

The Austrian Government asserts that the subject-matter of the proceedings, as indicated by the form of order sought by the action, renders the action inadmissible. It argues that the Court has consistently held that the subject-matter of proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty is delimited by the pre-litigation procedure. It is determined by the Commission's reasoned opinion. The action may therefore not be founded on complaints other than those referred to in the reasoned opinion. The demand that contracts awarded in contravention of Community law but not yet performed should, as far as possible, be cancelled is not found in the Commission's reasoned opinion of 21 February 1996. It is at most touched upon in the letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995. The complaint referred to in the action, namely, of failure to cancel contracts which could still be cancelled, on which the form of order sought is decisively based, is therefore inadmissible.

16 It must be conceded to the Austrian Government that the Court has consistently held that the subject-matter of proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations is defined by the pre-litigation procedure and the form of order sought by the action. At the same time, the application may not contain any complaints which are fundamentally different or new as compared with those discussed in the pre-litigation procedure. That approach can be explained by reference to the structure of proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty, which gives the parties an opportunity to reach an amicable settlement in the course of the pre-litigation procedure, before the matter is referred to the Court. Moreover, the Member State's rights of defence must be safeguarded, so that it may not be confronted with new complaints in the application.

17 The question is therefore whether the complaint of failure to cancel contracts awarded before 6 February 1996 constitutes a new and thus inadmissible plea. In this regard, the pre-litigation procedure and the form of order sought by the action must be examined in the light of the actual course of events.

18 The Commission's letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995, which was addressed to the Austrian Government following the bilateral meeting of 27 and 28 November 1995, objects, on the one hand, to a legal situation which is contrary to Community law and, on the other, to award practices contrary to Community law which are based on that situation. The request for the immediate bringing of the award practices into conformity with Community law (11) is to be found in the letter of formal notice. Elsewhere, the Commission extends its complaints `specifically to include those lots for which the contract has already been awarded but the tendering procedure was not in conformity with Community law'. (12) Finally, the Commission requests the Republic of Austria `to ensure that Community law is complied with in the award procedures still outstanding. It further requests the Republic of Austria to suspend the legal effects or prevent the completion of contracts already awarded in contravention of Community law [and] to defer pending award decisions until such time as compliance with Community law is secured, ...'. (13)

19 Those words clearly express not only the Commission's requirement that further conduct contrary to Community law be prevented with immediate effect, but also the demand that award decisions taken in contravention of Community law be denied operative effect. However, the latter demand can only imply retaking such decisions subsequently in a manner consistent with Community law. An obligation to cancel award decisions already taken must therefore be inferred from the Commission's request as formulated in the letter of formal notice.

20 A request to intervene in award procedures already subject to implementation cannot be inferred with equal certainty from the Commission's reasoned opinion of 21 February 1996. Nevertheless, it may be inferred from the reasoned opinion that pending procedures are included in the general complaint that award practices were contrary to Community law. When the Commission takes the view that the undertakings given by the Austrian Government concerning the obligation to advertise in the future expressly do not go far enough, and when it complains that they do not cover `those cases of awards where contracts are, for example, advertised nationally', (14) there can be no doubt that the Commission is identifying breaches of Community law in respect of past award practices and is demanding that they be remedied. Thus the Commission emphasises `that it is incumbent on the Austrian authorities to take all appropriate steps to put an end to the infringements described'. (15)

21 Moreover, neither the reasoned opinion nor the actual course of events suggested that the request to intervene in award procedures already being implemented, which had already been made in the letter of formal notice, had been complied with. It may be assumed from this that the Austrian Government understood the Commission's request in the sense described here. In its reply of 22 March 1996, it devoted over three-and-a-half pages to commenting on these issues, under the heading `The contracts already awarded'. (16) Any allegation of a breach of the principle of a fair hearing, which could be inferred from the objection to admissibility, is therefore also without foundation.

22 The Austrian Government is of the opinion that an express request to cancel contracts already awarded should have been included in the reasoned opinion. The steps to be taken should have been specified. Once a number of points, such as amendment of the Lower Austrian Vergabegesetz and the AAVB, had been mentioned, it was entitled to expect that no further measures would be required.

23 That view cannot be accepted. The Court has held (17) that the Commission is not required to specify what steps are to be taken to remedy a situation which is contrary to the Treaty. That allocation of tasks is also sensible since it is a Member State's responsibility to decide how and by what means it will comply with the requirements of Community law. If the Commission were required to specify the steps to be taken, jurisdictional conflicts would arise whenever the Member State has discretion as to the manner in which it creates a situation which is in conformity with Community law.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

24 Nor, in this case, did the Commission create a legitimate expectation which would have entitled the Austrian authorities to assume that, by amending the legal situation, they had done everything necessary to remedy the Treaty infringement. On the contrary, as already explained, the Commission included the pending procedures in the letter of formal notice. In the reasoned opinion it expressly drew attention to the obligations resulting `directly from the directly applicable Community legislation' for the contracting authorities of the Land of Lower Austria in the `absence of transposition in conformity with Community law' (18) and emphasised that it was incumbent on the Austrian authorities to take all appropriate steps to put an end to the infringements.

25 Against that background, the complaint of failure to cancel contracts concluded in contravention of Community law can be regarded as falling within the subject-matter of the proceedings properly defined in the form of order sought by the action.

2. Putting an end to the infringements before the expiry of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion

26 The Austrian Government points out that under the second paragraph of Article 169 of the Treaty and the case-law relating thereto the material time for the existence of a Treaty infringement is the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. However, on that date, 7 March 1996, Austria had put an end to all the infringements complained of in the reasoned opinion.

27 The AAVB, it submits, have been amended along the lines required by the Commission and, in their new version, have formed the basis for all invitations to tender published in accordance with Community provisions since as long ago as 12 December 1995. Moreover, the award practices have also been modified since 6 February 1996. Since that date, the working committee on awards has no longer approved award recommendations submitted to it for a decision, and has decided to terminate immediately all pending award procedures not conducted in conformity with Community law and to hold a new invitation to tender in conformity with Community law. Award decisions in respect of contracts with a total value of ATS 217 000 000 were deferred, and by 7 March 1996 contracts with a total value of approximately ATS 470 000 000 had been put up for tender and awarded in conformity with Community law. Since the Austrian authorities had complied with the requests on 7 March 1996, the action is claimed to be inadmissible.

28 The Commission replies that the situation was not completely regularised on 7 March 1996. The contracts already awarded but not yet performed on 6 February 1996, and the contracts already awarded and (partly) performed but which could still reasonably have been cancelled on 6 February 1996, remained in place.

29 It is in fact the case that, by its action for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty, the Commission is no longer bringing the charge that the legal situation is contrary to Community law, any more than it is criticising the award practices followed after 6 February 1996. It nevertheless considers that the failure to cancel, within the bounds of possibility, contracts concluded in contravention of Community law constitutes a continuing infringement of the Treaty. As already observed above, it has admissibly made that plea the subject-matter of the action.

30 Since the Commission considers and alleges that there existed, at the time of expiry of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion, a situation which it regards as contrary to Community law and which continues to produce legal effects, the requirements as to the admissibility of the action should be met. Whether an infringement of the Treaty actually existed at the material time is a question concerning the substance of the action. Thus, although on 7 March 1996 the Austrian authorities had already complied with the Commission's requests in substantial respects, the action is admissible in respect of the complaints still subsisting.

3. The determination of periods in the pre-litigation procedure

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

31 The Austrian Government further claims that the periods prescribed in the pre-litigation procedure were too short, with the result that, for that reason also, the action for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty is inadmissible. It refers to Austria's federal structure in which certain decision-making processes are bound to take certain time. The period of one week laid down in the letter of formal notice and that of two weeks laid down in the reasoned opinion were extremely short. As early as 25 January 1996, the Commission informed the international press that it had decided to address a reasoned opinion to Austria, but that opinion was not notified until 21 February 1996.

32 The Commission should also have taken into consideration, when setting the periods, the fact that its complaints referred exclusively to the past since, as notified to the Commission on 7 February 1996, the Austrian authorities had adapted their award practices since 6 February 1996. Finally, it submits that the period of 21 days provided for in Article 3(3) of Directive 89/665 is an indication of what constitutes a reasonable period.

33 The Commission, on the other hand, takes the view that the shortness of the periods was reasonable under the circumstances. According to the information provided by the Austrian authorities, contracts of substantial value were still outstanding at the beginning of December. An assurance that those contracts would be awarded with due regard for Community law and that pre-existing infringements would be remedied therefore had to be obtained from the Austrian Government as quickly as possible.

34 The Austrian Government's reply to the letter of formal notice allowed doubts to subsist as to its willingness to correct all the infringements complained of. Nor did it send the promised list with the calculation of the value of contracts still to be awarded. The Commission had to assume that, even at the beginning of 1996, a significant volume of contracts was still due to be awarded and had to prevent the creation of a fait accompli. Nor did the complaints in the reasoned opinion refer only to the past. The Commission definitely had in view the situation existing at the time of expiry of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. Finally, the Austrian Government had learned prematurely of the Commission's intentions through the press, so that it may not rely on the unreasonableness of the periods.

35 It is appropriate to begin the examination of the objection to the admissibility of the action by considering this last point. It must be assumed that the procedure preceding the Treaty infringement action is subject to a certain stringency of form. This is borne out by the requirements governing the designation of the subject-matter of proceedings and the reasonableness of periods to be complied with, which, if not observed, result in inadmissibility of the action. Matters which are of importance to the Member State concerned must be unambiguously apparent from the Commission's documents marking the individual stages of the procedure. Consequently, only the periods prescribed in the documents served on the Member State can be binding. A Member State cannot act on `hearsay' in the context of a formal pre-litigation procedure. There can therefore be no question of regarding the period between learning of the Commission's intentions through the press and formal service of the opinion as preparation time.

36 Beyond the purely legal assessment, I also consider it bad form to publish a press release about the imminent dispatch of a reasoned opinion in Treaty infringement proceedings against a Member State when the document in question is not served on the Member State concerned until almost four weeks later. The Commission could have allowed a longer period by dispatching the reasoned opinion at an earlier date. Earlier dispatch would have been possible under the circumstances.

37 For the remainder of the examination, therefore, it must be assumed that only the periods prescribed in the pre-litigation documents are relevant.

38 In order to be able to assess the reasonableness of a period, it is first important to ascertain what response it is hoped to elicit within the prescribed period. Alteration of a legal situation can certainly not be expected to take place within a period measured in weeks. Thus, the pre-litigation procedure was certainly concerned in part with a clause in the Lower Austrian Vergabegesetz which was contrary to Community law. There is no dispute that amendment of the law had not yet been carried out when the period laid down in the reasoned opinion expired on 7 March 1996. The procedure was not concluded until May 1996. Nevertheless, in that respect the Commission refrained from bringing the action for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty, since the amendment of the law entered into force without significant delay.

39 What mattered to the Commission, however, was that the Austrian Government should realise and formally acknowledge that the situation was contrary to Community law so that, on the one hand, further awards of contracts could be prevented and, on the other, the contracts awarded in contravention of Community law could, as far as possible, be cancelled.

40 In response to the letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995 the Austrian Government also gave an assurance, within the period of one week, that it would, `with immediate effect', (19) apply the Community directives to the contracts still to be awarded. In reality, however, the authorities continued to award the contracts still outstanding. The award committee's decision to suspend the current procedures, which had been expected earlier, was not taken until 6 February 1996.

41 In view of the urgency of stopping further awards of contracts, at least for the time being, the period of one week was reasonable in this case. Indeed, the Austrian Government complied with the request by means of the statements in its reply of 22 December 1995. The discrepancy between words and actions must be examined separately.

42 With regard to the circumstances at the time of the adoption of the reasoned opinion, it is striking that it was only after the formal decision to dispatch the reasoned opinion had become known in the press that the award committee, on 6 February 1996, took the decision, inter alia, to suspend current award procedures. The Commission therefore had reason to suppose that the Austrian authorities were creating a fait accompli and that urgency was required. Viewed in that way, the short period of two weeks laid down in the reasoned opinion also seems reasonable.

43 The possibility of applying for interim legal protection, to which attention was drawn in both pre-litigation documents and which was also raised at the hearing, must also be viewed in this context. Under Article 186 of the Treaty, the Court may prescribe necessary interim measures only in cases already pending before it. However, an action under Article 169 of the Treaty may be brought only after the pre-litigation procedure has been concluded. Where there is increased danger in any delay, the Commission must therefore bring the pre-litigation procedure to a rapid conclusion in order, as far as possible, to prevent irreparable infringements.

44 That situation may be regarded as a weakness of the system, but it can be remedied only by amendment of the relevant legal bases. Nor do the possibilities provided for by Directive 89/665 (20) offer a satisfactory solution as a way out of the dilemma. The directive applies primarily to the relationship between the tenderer and the contracting authority. Moreover, the possibilities afforded to the Commission in Article 3 of the directive are not suited to all situations and in any case do not limit the Commission's authority to initiate proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty.

45 In the light of all the foregoing considerations, the periods prescribed by the Commission in the pre-litigation procedure must be regarded as reasonable under the circumstances.

4. The clear and precise nature of the form of order sought by the action

46 The Austrian Government expresses legal reservations about the phrase `contracts, which were concluded before 6 February 1996 but which, on 7 March 1996, had not yet been performed or could reasonably have been cancelled' in the form of order sought by the action. By using the expression `could reasonably have been cancelled', the Commission shows that it, too, does not think that there is an unlimited obligation to cancel contracts, but it fails to provide a definition of reasonableness. The form of order sought is therefore too imprecise to form the basis of an obligation to act resulting from Article 171 of the Treaty, thus rendering the action as such inadmissible.

47 The Commission takes the view that the Court is not required to rule on what is and what is not to be regarded, in specific terms, as reasonable in a Member State. That is the task of the national courts applying national law. Observations on the question of reasonableness are therefore irrelevant from the outset in the context of these proceedings before the Court.

48 On this point, the Commission's view must be endorsed without qualification. It is neither the task of the Commission nor that of the Court to investigate the possibilities for cancelling contracts concluded in the field of public procurement. On the contrary, an instruction - whether from the Commission or the Court - to cancel a contract under a Member State's legal rule to be specified would constitute an ultra vires act by the Community institutions vis-à-vis that Member State's authorities. That freedom of the Member State to choose the form and the means must necessarily also find expression in a request by the Commission to put an end to a situation contrary to the Treaty. This relative lack of precision as regards the steps to be taken is therefore, in the final analysis, a manifestation of the division of powers between the Community and the Member State. The wording at issue defines the objective of unwinding contracts awarded in contravention of Community law within the limits of what is legally possible. The form of order sought is therefore not open to objection.

5. Legal interest in bringing proceedings

49 The question concerning the legal interest in bringing the present action represents an objection to admissibility which, while not expressly raised by the Austrian Government, nevertheless follows implicitly from the objections to admissibility which are raised by it. When the Austrian Government asserts that the infringements concerned are by their very nature irreparable, it is indeed questionable whether any interest is served by an abstract finding of failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty. The Austrian Government's view, that the denunciation of a Member State is neither the subject-matter nor the purpose of Treaty infringement proceedings, must be endorsed.

50 In order to assess the legal interest in bringing proceedings, it is important to ascertain whether the Commission's request is directed towards an objectively impossible act or whether there are ways and means of complying with the Commission's requirements, on the basis that the material time is the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. The issue thus identified is ultimately a question to be answered in the examination of the merits of the action. The answer to the question concerning the legal interest in bringing proceedings must therefore await an examination of the merits of the action.

II. Merits

51 The Commission points out, firstly, that Austria has been required to comply with the provisions of Community law, including the legislation on the award of contracts, since its accession to the EEA Agreement with effect from 1 January 1994 and, a fortiori, since the date of its accession to the European Union, that is 1 January 1995.

52 It alleges that, in the case of the contracts awarded in the period from 27 November 1995 to 6 February 1996, which had a total value of more than ATS 360 000 000, Austria infringed several provisions of Community law. Thus, Articles 8, 10(6), 11(6) and (11), 12 and 30 of Directive 93/37, Article 30 of the Treaty and Articles 1(1) and (3) and 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665 were infringed. The Commission sets out the alleged infringements in detail. There is, it argues, no justification under Community law for the conduct engaged in during the period in question, which was aimed at `getting the contracts home and dry'.

53 As evidenced by the Austrian Government's reply to the reasoned opinion, the Austrian authorities consciously acted `at their own risk'. Modification of the award practices would not, unlike amendment of the Vergabegesetz, have necessitated any time-consuming procedures, a fact proved by the award committee's decision adopted subsequently. Finally, the award of some of the contracts in question (21) could have been delayed without harm to the project as a whole.

54 The Austrian Government takes the view that the cancellation of contracts concluded in contravention of Community law cannot be required in the context of Treaty infringement proceedings. The second paragraph of Article 2(6) of Directive 89/665 leaves a Member State free to limit itself to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement. In principle, the Commission cannot require more in proceedings under Article 169 of the Treaty.

55 Moreover, it submits, the Commission shows that even it does not assume that there is an absolute obligation to cancel contracts. In any case, the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations precludes such an obligation. The legitimate expectations of parties to a contract are worthy of protection and take precedence over the Commission's application. Finally, the practical effect of Directive 93/37, in the form of equal conditions of competition, can no longer be ensured even by the cancellation of contracts. The initially successful tenderers had made arrangements giving them clear advantages over their competitors. Cancelling the contracts concerned would have entailed stopping the construction work and therefore, in the final analysis, have been impossible for that reason also.

56 In conclusion, the Austrian Government raises two points of law of a fundamental nature. Firstly, it brings up the legal status of Nöplan, and links to that the question of how far individuals are entitled to rely on a directive as against that institution. Secondly, it considers that it has not been made clear why the large St Pölten project should have been made subject to the directives on the award of contracts since as long ago as Austria's accession to the European Economic Area. The project, which must be viewed as a whole and therefore cannot be divided up, was started even before the entry into force of the EEA Agreement and before Austria's accession to the Community.

57 The Commission replies that its powers under Article 169 of the Treaty are separate from the procedure under Directive 89/665. The Court has already found to that effect elsewhere. (22) With regard to Nöplan's role, it observes that it has indisputably been unanimously assumed that Nöplan is to be regarded as the extension of the Land of Lower Austria in its function as a contracting authority.

58 For reasons of methodology, it is appropriate to begin the examination with the last-mentioned legal reservations expressed by the Austrian Government.

59 The question as to the applicability of the Community legislation on the award of contracts at the time of the Republic of Austria's accession to the EEA can be left aside here since that legislation in any case became binding on the acceding Member State by virtue of its membership of the European Community on 1 January 1995 and did so - unless transitional periods had been expressly negotiated - immediately upon accession.

60 The Commission has already expressed the view in the pre-litigation procedure that Directive 93/37 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts is applicable, pursuant to Article 6 thereof, to the construction project. (23)

Article 6(1) and (3) provide:

`1. The provisions of this Directive shall apply to public works contracts whose estimated value

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

net of VAT is not less than ECU 5 000 000. (24)

...

3. Where a work is subdivided into several lots, each one the subject of a contract, the value of each lot must be taken into account for the purpose of calculating the amounts referred to in paragraph 1. Where the aggregate value of the lots is not less than the amount referred to in paragraph 1, the provisions of that paragraph shall apply to all lots. Contracting authorities shall be permitted to depart from this provision for lots whose estimated value net of VAT is less than ECU 1 000 000, provided that the total estimated value of all the lots exempted does not, in consequence, exceed 20% of the total estimated value of all lots.'

61 With regard solely to the value of the contract for the building services control system, which was the original cause of the dispute, the Commission stated in the reasoned opinion:

`... Although the value of the contract for the building services control system, for which tenders were invited only on a regional basis, is approximately ATS 26 million, that is, below the threshold value laid down in the directive, the provisions of the directive are applicable to such a contract pursuant to the second sentence of Article 6(3) (threshold value exceeded when lots are aggregated)'. (25)

62 That legal assessment, that is to say the finding that the contract is subject to Community law, is correct and also applies to other contracts forming part of the project as a whole. Apart from its reference to the legal status of Nöplan, the Austrian Government has not otherwise adduced before the Court any facts which might preclude the applicability of the relevant directives.

63 The reference to the legal status of Nöplan should now be examined. That body has already been the subject of discussions in the preliminary stage of these proceedings, including with regard to its status. The annexes to the application include a letter of 12 May 1995 from the Austrian Government to the Commission, setting out the control structure of Nöplan, which states:

`... The Nö Landeshauptstadt Planungsgesellschaft mbH (Nöplan) was established as a private-law partnership for the purpose of carrying out all planning measures necessary in connection with the construction of the capital of the Land of Lower Austria, St. Pölten. Its ownership is 51% in the hands of the Land of Lower Austria, 10% in the hands of the city of St Pölten and 39% in the hands of the NO HYPO Leasinggesellschaft mbH. The award of contracts with a value exceeding ATS 2 million requires the approval of the award committee. The award committee is appointed by the Land Government of Lower Austria. The members of the other organs of Nöplan (supervisory board, general meeting and finance committee) are appointed by the owners...'. (26)

64 Throughout the procedure before the Court the parties have assumed that Nöplan is an `extension' (`verlängerter Arm', lit. `extended arm') of the Land Government of Lower Austria. That term, although non-technical, graphically describes the dependency of the legal person on the politically responsible Land authorities. The basic decision of 6 February 1996 to suspend the current procedures, which fundamentally changed the course of the proceedings, was taken by the `Vergabeausschuß' (Award Committee).

65 Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 defines contracting authorities as: `the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations...'. It goes on to state:

`A "body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law;

The lists of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph are set out in Annex I....'

66 The Land of Lower Austria, as a local or regional authority, is indisputably a contracting authority. Even if one does not wish to limit oneself to the assessment that Nöplan is an `extension' of the Land, which simply means that responsibility rests ultimately with the Land, viewing Nöplan in isolation also leads to a similar result. According to the account (27) of the purpose, legal personality and economic control structure of Nöplan given by the Austrian Government in its letter of 12 May 1995, the company fulfils the criteria (28) laid down in the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 for classification as a `body governed by public law'. Such a body is to be regarded as a contracting authority within the meaning of the directive. (29)

67 The question as to which body is liable, in the final analysis, to meet any claims for compensation made by tenderers is one which must be assessed according to the law of the Member State concerned. In any event, it is the Member State which is liable in relation to the Community. (30) Since there is thus no doubt about where liability in principle lies under Community law governing the award of contracts, the issue to be resolved by the Court boils down to the legal and factual preconditions for the existence of an obligation to cancel contracts already concluded.

68 It is first necessary to examine the technical point that the powers in Treaty infringement proceedings should not go beyond the possibility, expressly granted to a Member State by the secondary legislation, of limiting the consequences of a contract award made in contravention of Community law to the award of damages to the tenderer harmed. The submission that both the procedure under Article 3 of Directive 89/665 and Treaty infringement proceedings have the same objective must be endorsed in so far as the objective is defined as compliance with the Community rules on the award of public contracts. However, it must also be borne in mind that the review procedures required by the directive are primarily concerned with the relationship between the tenderer and the contracting authority. The procedure under Article 3 of the directive, which gives the Commission power to act, is, as the Court has expressly held, (31) a preventive measure. The Commission's powers under Article 169 of the Treaty are neither altered nor replaced by the special procedure under the directive. (32) It can thus be assumed that the powers conferred on the Commission by Directive 89/665 do not restrict, either in form or in substance, its powers in Treaty infringement proceedings, which in principle are wide-ranging.

69 A particular problem arises in this case from the fact that the contracts still outstanding as part of the overall project at the time of expiry of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion were awarded in conformity with Community law. It must therefore first be established to what extent an infringement still existed at that time. The alleged infringement can be summed up in a short formula: by the conclusion of contracts awarded in contravention of Community law, the infringement was complete but not yet at an end. The contracts had still to be performed.

70 The following should be said with regard to the contracts which were awarded. There is no doubt that the award of those contracts was objectively contrary to Community law. A divergence between the legal situation in the Member State concerned at that time and the requirements of Community law is now indisputable. The Austrian Government came to share that assessment in due course and saw to it that both the criticised AAVB and the legal situation were adapted. It can also be assumed that the legislative bodies acted on the basis that the general legislation on the award of contracts was applicable to the large St Pölten project when they included the disputed exemption provision in the Lower Austrian Vergabegesetz.

71 However, the latter point is not of decisive importance. It is established that the award procedures carried out in 1995 were objectively contrary to Community law. There is no need here to examine in detail the incompatibility of the legislation on the award of contracts which was then in force, since it has been acknowledged by the Austrian authorities and rectified by amending the law to bring it into conformity with the requirements of Community law and the Commission no longer raises this issue in these proceedings.

72 It is however questionable to what extent, after 27 and 28 November 1995, the objective breach of Community law assumed a different quality to which an obligation to cancel contracts concluded after that date could, if appropriate, be attached.

73 The Commission takes the view that the Austrian authorities were already aware of the problem with respect to Community law as a result of the exchange of correspondence which took place in the course of 1995. However, the whole issue was discussed in detail at the bilateral meeting on 27 and 28 November 1995, so that, in awarding contracts after that date, the Austrian authorities acted against their better knowledge.

74 The Austrian Government's response is to say, as the Austrian Government's representative expressly pointed out at the hearing, that the discussions during the meetings took place in a non-binding context: those discussions could have no legally binding effects. Moreover, initially the Austrian authorities had, with good reason, taken a different view and only later deferred to the Commission's views.

75 It is indeed questionable how far the Austrian Government should have assumed that the view expressed by the Commission at the bilateral meeting was binding. An informal meeting of that kind is not capable of producing direct legal effects. However, it must not be forgotten that, objectively speaking, an infringement existed and there was a danger that continuation of the practices contrary to Community law could have serious and, in part, irreparable economic consequences. Once Treaty infringement proceedings had been officially initiated by the letter of formal notice of 15 December 1995, the Austrian authorities were obliged to prevent further damage. As already intimated, that did not require a lengthy procedure to amend the law; provisional suspension pending investigation of the situation would have sufficed. The subsequent decision adopted by the award committee on 6 February 1996 shows that such an approach was also possible in practice.

76 I am therefore of the opinion that the awarding of contracts from the time of the official initiation of Treaty infringement proceedings until the decision of 6 February 1996 constituted a serious infringement of Community law, to which an obligation to cancel the contracts in question could undoubtedly also be attached. These were, after all, contracts with a total value considerably in excess of ATS 300 000 000, which were awarded over a period of over six weeks. In so far as the contracts concluded during that period were valid and not yet performed on 3 March 1996, the infringement subsisted and the Commission was entitled to require cancellation of the contracts. That demand does not seem unreasonable, moreover, since the Austrian authorities expressly acted `at their own risk'. (33) Acting `at one's own risk' can hardly mean creating a fait accompli to which no penalty can be attached.

77 When the Austrian Government argues before the Court that it is impossible to cancel contracts at issue, the nature of that impossibility, whether it is original or subsequent, in law or in fact, matters. In so far as it is subsequent impossibility on factual grounds, because the construction project has in the meantime been carried out, that circumstance cannot in any way alter the situation with regard to obligations as at 7 March 1996. Moreover, the Court has held that a Member State may not rely on a fait accompli which it itself created so as to escape Treaty infringement proceedings.

78 The argument based on the initial impossibility of cancelling the contracts concerned because of the urgency of continuing with the construction work must also be assessed against that background. The Commission's demand that the contracts be cancelled was made only with regard to those contracts which were concluded at the contracting authority's own risk in the knowledge that they were possibly contrary to Community law. The Member State could have avoided such a demand if it had, without delay, taken steps, in the form of a decision such as that adopted on 6 February 1996, in order to prevent a fait accompli.

79 This approach is supported by a consideration underlying Directive 93/37. Article 7(3)(c) of the directive entitles the contracting authorities to award their public works contracts by negotiated procedure when, for reasons of extreme urgency, the time-limit laid down cannot be kept. However, the reasons invoked must be attributable to events unforeseen by the contracting authorities in question.

80 Although the foregoing considerations are valid with respect to alleged cases of de facto impossibility, the consequences of de jure impossibility are still uncertain. The assessment under Community law comes up against a limitation here. As the Commission rightly states, and as has already been touched upon in the examination of admissibility, any cancellation of contracts falls within the competence of the Member State. The legal bases and extent of any cancellations are governed by national law and therefore cannot be established bindingly here.

81 The Austrian Government's submissions are therefore of vital importance. They contain a series of reasons explaining why contract cancellation after the event is impossible, yet at no stage is it maintained that this was a case of absolute initial impossibility on legal grounds. Since the Austrian Government has also consistently expressed the view before the Court that the Commission's demand for contracts to be cancelled was unjustified, it can be assumed that it certainly made no attempt to comply with the demand at the time.

82 For the remainder of this examination it must be assumed that the impossibility of cancelling contracts was in any case not absolute. Even if there had been only one possibility, the Commission's demand would not have sought something which was impossible. It must therefore be assumed that the Commission's demand entailed a legal obligation to act.

83 The Austrian Government then contends before the Court that contract cancellation was unreasonable because of the legitimate expectations of the parties to those contracts, which takes precedence over the Commission's demand. That argument is mistaken. The Austrian Government is relying on third parties' legal positions which were illegally created by the contracting authority. As far as the fundamental situation regarding a Member State's obligations towards the Community is concerned, a Member State may not successfully rely on the consequences of its illegal conduct in order to call into question the legal obligation as such. To what extent contract cancellation was reasonable in this particular case is not, as has already been shown, a matter for the Court to assess.

84 Finally, it is necessary to examine the Austrian Government's argument that the practical effect of the directives could no longer be ensured once the contracts had been awarded. It is submitted that competitive positions had been affected in such a way that the situation which existed before the contracts were awarded could no longer be restored. The tenderers who had originally participated would always have retained a competitive advantage over any subsequent tenderers. That line of argument may be relevant in point of fact. However, it cannot invalidate any attempt to put an end to illegal conduct. If necessary, a new invitation to tender issued on a Community-wide basis, for example, would have enabled undertakings to participate which, under the circumstances, simply had no knowledge of the original invitation to tender. Those potential tenderers cannot - after the event - be individually identified, so that they will never be able to make any claims for damages.

85 It must therefore be concluded that, on 7 March 1996, the Commission's demand entailed an obligation to take action, the objective initial impossibility of which it has not been possible to establish.

86 Finally, it is necessary to return once again to the question concerning the legal interest in bringing proceedings, which could not be answered in the context of the examination of admissibility. Since it may be assumed that an abstract obligation to act existed but that the Austrian Government has consistently disputed it, a legal interest in bringing proceedings must, for that reason alone, be acknowledged. Moreover, a declaratory judgment in the present proceedings may play a part in any litigation concerning any claims for damages, so that for that reason also a legal interest in bringing these proceedings must be acknowledged.

Costs

87 In accordance with Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs. Since the Austrian Government has been unsuccessful in its arguments and submissions, it must be ordered to pay the costs.

C - Conclusion

88 In the light of the foregoing I propose that the Court:

(1) Declare that, in connection with the construction of a new administrative and cultural centre for the Land of Lower Austria at St Pölten, the Republic of Austria has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 and Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 and under Article 30 of the EC Treaty in awarding contracts which were awarded after the initiation of proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations under the Treaty and before 6 February 1996 but which, on 7 March 1996, had not yet been performed or could reasonably have been cancelled.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Alber delivered on 19 March 1998.
Commission of the European Communities v Kingdom of Belgium.
Failure by a Member State to fulfil obligations - Public works contracts - Directives 89/440/EEC and 93/37/EEC - Failure to publish a contract notice - Application of negotiated procedure without justification.
Case C-323/96.

A - Introduction

1 These proceedings for failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations under the Treaty relate to the interpretation of Directives 89/440/EEC and 93/37/EEC (1) concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts for the construction of a building for the Vlaamse Raad. Most of the contracts for the regional parliament building were awarded by a negotiated procedure and Lot 4 was awarded by a restricted procedure. The Commission considers that such conduct constitutes failure to comply with the requirements on tendering and publication established by the directives.

2 The Belgian Government, on the other hand, is of the opinion that the regional parliament, as a legislative body, cannot be bound by decisions of the minister responsible under the legal system of a Member State for the award of public contracts. It maintains that the Vlaamse Raad was therefore entitled to refrain from complying with the provisions of Community law relating to the publication of notices for public works contracts.

3 The Commission claims that the Court should:

- declare that the Kingdom of Belgium has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directives 89/440/EEC and 93/37/EEC, and in particular Articles 7 and 11 of Directive 93/37/EEC, in so far as it did not place a notice in the Official Journal of the European Communities, either for the overall project or for the individual lots, for the construction of a building for the Vlaamse Raad and it did not apply the award procedures in accordance with those directives;

- order the defendant to pay the costs.

4 The Belgian Government does not seek a specific form of order in its defence.

5 I shall refer to the submissions of the parties in the course of the opinion.

B - Opinion

6 The Commission takes the view that the Vlaamse Raad is undoubtedly a `contracting authority' within the meaning of the Directive. It maintains that the Directive was therefore applicable to the construction project in question. In awarding the contract by a negotiated procedure, the Vlaamse Raad failed to fulfil its obligations under the Directive.

7 The Belgian Government formulates its defence on various levels. However, there is a substantive element common to the various grounds of defence in that they all have recourse to the argument relating to the independence of the contracting authority by virtue of its nature as a legislative body.

The national legislation applicable to the award procedure carried out at the turn of the year 1996/97 was the Law of 14 July 1976 (2) on public contracts, including the provisions adopted for its implementation. That Law assumes that only the executive is bound by the award provisions. Although a new law was adopted on 24 December 1993, (3) its entry into force was delayed by the fact that the decrees (4) necessary for its implementation had not been adopted. In that context, the considerable problems connected with the special constitutional position of legislative bodies, which are relevant in this case, were discussed both at national level and in contacts with the Commission, but no solution which was satisfactory for all the parties concerned could be reached. The Belgian Government is of the opinion that the Commission did not provide it with the necessary assistance in the search for a solution and that, consequently, the bringing of the action giving rise to the present proceedings was unreasonable. It contends that the timing of the action taken against the Belgian Government was also particularly unfavourable since the events in question fall within the temporal context of the achievement of constitutional autonomy by the regions, a period of radical change which was accompanied by legal uncertainties.

According to the Belgian Government, allowance should in any case be made for the fact that the Vlaamse Raad - or the Flemish Parliament, as it has since become known - is a legislative body which is independent in accordance with the understanding of democracy prevailing in the Member States and underlying the Treaty of Maastricht. It is clear from the Directive itself that there are fields to which it does not apply, as Article 4 of the Directive shows.

8 In reply to those arguments, the Commission asserts that internal problems in the legal system of a Member State cannot release it from the duty to comply with Community law. Moreover, a parliament is also obliged to observe Community law.

9 Article 7 of Directive 93/37 lays down the criteria for determining whether an `open procedure', (5) a `restricted procedure' (6) or a `negotiated procedure' (7) must be held. Thus, Article 7(2) defines the conditions for holding a negotiated procedure with prior publication of a contract notice and Article 7(3) defines those for holding a negotiated procedure without prior publication. Article 7(4) states: `In all other cases, the contracting authorities shall award their public works contracts by the open procedure or by the restricted procedure'.

10 Since the construction project in question does not fulfil any of the criteria justifying a negotiated procedure without prior publication, the provisions of Article 11 of the Directive relating to publication of a notice must be complied with in so far as the Vlaamse Raad is to be regarded as a contracting authority within the meaning of the Directive. Article 1(b) of the Directive defines contracting authorities as `the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law'.

11 The State, according to the classical understanding of that concept in public law, comprises three powers: the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. At an abstract level, the organs of the three powers are bound by Community law. The Court held that to be a general principle in its judgment in Von Colson and Kamann which states: `However, the Member States' obligation arising from a directive to achieve the result envisaged by the directive and their duty under Article 5 of the Treaty to take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, to ensure the fulfilment of that obligation, is binding on all the authorities of Member States including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts.' (8) In that respect, the binding effect on the courts of a directive has been positively established.

12 The question concerning the binding effect on the administration of the provisions of Community law relating to public contracts was the subject-matter of the Costanzo case. (9) In that case, the Court held that the obligations arising under the provisions of a directive `are binding upon all the authorities of the Member States'. (10) The Court goes on to state that in all the defined circumstances in which individuals may rely on the provisions of a directive `all organs of the administration, including decentralised authorities such as municipalities, are obliged to apply those provisions'. (11) In that respect, the binding effect on State authorities must also be regarded as positively established.

13 The only question therefore is whether the legislature is also bound by Community directives.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

In principle, that question must be answered in the affirmative since the obligation to legislate contained in a directive is always addressed directly to the legislative bodies. Beyond that abstract approach, in the field of public contracts, the Court held in its judgment in the Beentjes (12) case that the term `the State' must be `interpreted in functional terms'. (13) In the previous case-law on public contracts, the question whether a body awarding a works contract is a contracting authority within the meaning of the Directive arose as a rule in terms different from those in question in this case. The issue has been principally whether subsidiary bodies and institutions had failed to comply with the award provisions. (14)$

14 A parliament, on the other hand, as an organ of State power, is certainly part of the State in functional terms. The same is obviously true of the parliaments of the constituent States in a federal structure.

15 What is exceptional in this case is that the Vlaamse Raad was confronted with Directive 93/37, not in its original capacity as a legislature, but in the course of its administrative activities in the form of fiscal acts. However, that circumstance is no reason for exempting it from the procedural requirements of Community law relating to transparency and publicity in the field of public contracts. On the contrary, there is all the more reason to assume that the Vlaamse Raad is bound by the Directive when it is not entitled, since it is not acting in a legislative capacity, to rely on its original independence vis-à-vis the administration.

16 Moreover, at the hearing the Belgian Government's representative conceded that in reality the Vlaamse Raad did not act in its capacity as a legislature when it awarded the contract. According to the Belgian Government, the freedom invoked is founded on the exceptional nature of the constitutional situation. Thus, it justifies the use of the procedure at issue by reference to its own domestic legal situation. It maintains that the Law of 14 July 1976 expressly rendered only the executive subject to the award provisions.

17 As the Commission correctly argues, it is settled case-law of the Court of Justice that a Member State may not rely on its own legal system or an interpretation thereof in order to justify conduct which is contrary to Community law. (15) Doubts as to whether the Belgian legal situation was in conformity with Community law had certainly been raised at the time in question. The Belgian Government itself states that it intended to remedy defects in the Law of 14 July 1976 by means of the Law of 24 December 1993. According to it, there were still disagreements with regard to the role of legislative bodies. In that context, it contends that the Commission failed to provide it with the necessary assistance.

18 It may be unfortunate that the Commission did not provide the assistance hoped for from it during the legislative procedure. However, from the time of the institution of the Treaty infringement proceedings at the latest, there could be no doubt about the Commission's attitude. The letter of formal notice instituting the Treaty infringement procedure dates from 28 July 1994 and the Belgian Government replied to it on 31 August of that year. Over a year later, on 16 November 1995, the Commission addressed its reasoned opinion to the defendant government, which replied by letter of 15 December 1995. The Commission finally brought its action on 2 October 1996.

19 While it is true that the communication problems between the Vlaamse Raad, the Permanent Representation of Belgium and the Commission, which are mentioned by the Belgian Government, may explain the attitude of the Vlaamse Raad, they cannot justify its conduct in a legal sense. The obligations relating to publication contained in the Directive are directly applicable and in that respect were also binding on the Vlaamse Raad.

20 At the hearing, the Belgian Government's representative expressly referred once again to the provisions of the Directive authorising derogation, and in particular to Article 4, in order to show that there are indeed fields which a State could legitimately regard as falling outside the scope of the provisions on the award of public contracts.

21 Against that it must be stated that, in this particular case, Article 4 offers no grounds for disregarding the obligations which arise from the Directive. Article 4(1) merely provides for derogation in respect of certain fields, referring to certain provisions of Council Directive 90/531/EEC on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors. (16) Article 4(2) excludes from the scope of the Directive those works contracts `which are declared secret or the execution of which must be accompanied by special security measures in accordance with the laws, regulations or administrative provisions in force in the Member State concerned or when the protection of the basic interests of the Member State's security so requires'. The Belgian Government has not put forward any facts which justify application of the provision authorising derogation, whether by mentioning specific laws, regulations or administrative provisions declaring the works contract secret or by pleading special security measures or the protection of essential interests of the State.

22 It is settled case-law that provisions authorising derogations from directives in the field of public works contracts must be interpreted strictly. (17) A general reliance, unsupported by more specific factors, on the principle of the separation of powers cannot therefore be construed as pleading the protection of essential interests of the State.

23 In view of the independence of the Vlaamse Raad as a legislative body, the question still arises, in any event, of the liability of the Member State in the context of proceedings under Article 169 of the Treaty. In this respect also, reference may be made to settled case-law of the Court which states that the liability of a Member State under Article 169 arises whatever the agency of the State whose action or inaction is the cause of the failure to fulfil its obligations, even in the case of a constitutionally independent institution. (18)

24 I therefore conclude that the form of order sought by the Commission should be granted.

Costs

In accordance with the first paragraph of Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the defendant has been unsuccessful, it must be ordered to pay the costs.

C - Conclusion

25 In the light of the foregoing I propose that the Court:

(1) declare that, by failing to comply with the requirements in the field of tendering procedures and publication in respect of the award of both the overall project and the various lots concerning the construction of a building for the Vlaamse Raad, the Kingdom of Belgium has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directives 89/440/EEC and 93/37/EEC, in particular Articles 7 and 11 of Directive 93/37;

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Lenz delivered on 6 March 1997.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Directive 93/36/EEC - Failure to transpose within the prescribed period.
Case C-312/96.

1 In these proceedings, the Commission alleges that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, (1) and in particular under Article 34 thereof, by failing to adopt the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to implement the directive. In the alternative, the Commission seeks a declaration that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under the above provisions by not immediately informing the Commission of such measures.

2 Article 34 of the directive requires the Member States to bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative measures necessary to comply with the directive before 14 June 1994 and immediately inform the Commission thereof.

3 The French Republic does not deny that it has not transposed the directive within the prescribed period. It merely states that the relevant draft legislation has been entered on the parliamentary agenda for the year 1996/97.

4 As it is clear, therefore, that the directive in question has not been transposed within the prescribed period, there is no need to examine the Commission's alternative plea.

5 I therefore propose that the Court declare that, by failing to adopt within the prescribed period the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to transpose Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under that directive and in particular under Article 34 thereof. I also propose that the French Republic be ordered to pay the costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Lenz delivered on 6 March 1997.
Commission of the European Communities v French Republic.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Directive 93/38/EEC - Failure to transpose within the prescribeb period.
Case C-311/96.

1 In these proceedings, the Commission alleges that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, (1) and in particular Article 45, by failing to adopt the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to implement the directive. In the alternative, the Commission seeks a declaration that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under the above provisions by not immediately informing the Commission of such measures.

2 Article 45 requires Member States to adopt the measures necessary to transpose the directive, apply them by 1 July 1994 (2) and inform the Commission thereof immediately.

3 The French Republic does not deny that it has not transposed the directive within the prescribed period. It merely states that the relevant draft legislation has been entered on the parliamentary agenda for the year 1996/97.

4 As it is clear, therefore, that the directive in question has not been transposed within the prescribed period, there is no need to examine the Commission's alternative plea.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Lenz delivered on 29 May 1997.
Hera SpA v Unità sanitaria locale no 3 - genovese (USL) and Impresa Romagnoli SpA.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Tribunale amministrativo regionale della Liguria - Italy.
Directive 93/37/EEC - Public procurement - Abnormally low tenders.
Case C-304/96.

A - Introduction

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling from the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale (Regional Administrative Court), Liguria, concerns the Community legislation governing the award of public works contracts.

2 On 19 December 1995 the Unità Sanitaria Locale No 3, Liguria (the local health authority), published an invitation to tender for works relating to the internal reorganization and technological adaptation of the `Vecchio Istituto del Presidio Socio Sanitario' in Genoa. (1) According to the invitation to tender, the contract was to be awarded to the tenderer offering the maximum discount against the base price of LIT 16 463 000 000.

3 Hera SpA submitted the best tender, offering a discount of 17.3%. However, that bid was excluded from the tendering procedure on the ground that it was abnormally low, with the result that the contract was awarded to Impresa Romagnoli SpA.

4 The contracting authority based its decision on Law No 109 (`Legge quadro in materia de lavori pubblici'), (2) in the version resulting from Decree-Law No 101 of 3 April 1995, (3) and Law No 216 of 2 June 1995. (4) Article 21(1a) of Law No 109 provides that `until 1 January 1997, (5) tenders in which the percentage discount exceeds by more than one-fifth the average of the discounts in all the tenders admitted shall be excluded from public works contracts for amounts above or below the Community threshold'.

5 Hera brought an action contesting the decision to exclude it from the tendering procedure, relying in particular on the relevant provisions of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts. (6) Article 30 of that Directive concerns the criteria on which awards are to be based. Article 30(4) provides as follows:

`If, for a given contract, tenders appear to be abnormally low in relation to the works, the contracting authority shall, before it may reject those tenders, request, in writing, details of the constituent elements of the tender which it considers relevant and shall verify those constituent elements taking account of the explanations received.

The contracting authority may take into consideration explanations which are justified on objective grounds including the economy of the construction method, or the technical solution chosen, or the exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer for the execution of the work, or the originality of the work proposed by the tenderer.

If the documents relating to the contract provide for its award at the lowest price tendered, the contracting authority must communicate to the Commission the rejection of tenders which it considers to be too low.

However, until the end of 1992, (7) if current national law so permits, the contracting authority may exceptionally, without any discrimination on grounds of nationality, reject tenders which are abnormally low in relation to the works, without being obliged to comply with the procedure provided for in the first subparagraph if the number of such tenders for a particular contract is so high that implementation of this procedure would lead to a considerable delay and jeopardize the public [interest] attaching to the execution of the contract in question. Recourse to this exceptional procedure shall be mentioned in the notice referred to in Article 11(5).'

6 The national court concluded that, in the case before it, the contracting authority had correctly applied the Italian legislation providing for the exclusion of abnormally low tenders. It held, however, that there was a `clear discrepancy' between that legislation and Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37.

7 The national court accordingly concluded that, in order to arrive at a decision in the dispute before it, it was necessary to seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice under Article 177 of the EC Treaty. It therefore referred to the Court the question whether the Community rules allow - and if so in what cases - a Member State to make temporary exceptions regarding the entry into force of directives where the latter set an express time-limit. (8)

B - Analysis

Admissibility

8 It appears from the facts described that the question here is whether, after 31 December 1992, the Italian authorities were entitled to allow derogations from a provision of Directive 93/37, which was to be transposed into domestic law by 19 July 1990 at the latest. As the Commission has rightly observed, the question referred by the national court has further implications. The real question before the Court is, very generally speaking, whether a Member State may unilaterally postpone the date of entry into force of a directive and, if so, subject to what conditions. It is not, however, the Court's role in exercising its jurisdiction under Article 177 of the Treaty to deliver advisory opinions on general or hypothetical questions. (9)

9 The Commission's proposal that the wording of the question be adjusted ought therefore to be upheld. It is clear from the order for reference that the national court is asking whether provisions such as Article 21(1a) of Law No 109 are compatible with Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37 regarding the treatment of abnormally low tenders.

10 The Italian Government takes the view that there is no need to give a ruling on this question. It maintains that Directive 93/37 does not authorize the Member States to derogate from its provisions. Besides, in Costanzo, (10) the Court has already ruled that the provisions applying at the time of that judgment - which corresponded to Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37 - have direct effect. Thus the judgment in Costanzo gave the national court all the information needed to adjudicate in the dispute before it. That court should therefore refuse to apply the relevant part of Article 21(1a) of Law No 109 on the ground that it is contrary to Directive 93/37.

11 I agree that the reply to the question referred may be deduced from Costanzo, as well as from the judgment in Furlanis. (11) It should nevertheless be emphasized that in principle it is for the national court to assess whether or not it is necessary to seek a preliminary ruling, having regard to the circumstances of the individual case. The fact that it is relatively simple, on the basis of existing case-law, to answer a particular question referred for a preliminary ruling does not in itself mean that the question is inadmissible.

12 By way of an aside, I would point out that the Italian Government refers in its observations to the fact that the Minister responsible called on the authorities concerned, by circular of 7 October 1996, (12) to interpret and apply Article 21(1a) of Law No 109 consistently with Directive 93/37. Any inferences to be drawn from that circular - which was published after the main proceedings were initiated - are a matter for the national court.

The question

13 As the Commission has pointed out, the rule set out in Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37 corresponds in this case to that previously contained in Article 29(5) of Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(13) That provision had been introduced by Council Directive 89/440/EEC of 18 July 1989. (14) The measures implementing Directive 89/440, which was notified to the Member States on 19 July 1989, were to be adopted by the Member States in the year following its publication at the latest. (15) That deadline expired on 19 July 1990. The aim of Directive 93/37 was to consolidate Directive 71/305 together with the provisions amending it since the date of its adoption. (16) That is why - as the Commission has rightly pointed out - that Directive did not set the Member States a time-limit for its implementation. On the contrary, the applicable time-limits are those that were fixed for the various amending directives.

14 However, Article 29(5), fourth subparagraph, of Directive 71/305 (corresponding to Article 30(4), fourth subparagraph, of Directive 93/37) authorized, subject to strict conditions, and until the end of 1992, the rejection of abnormally low tenders without the need to follow the verification procedure laid down in the first subparagraph. The Court has already ruled (in Furlanis) that that provision must be narrowly construed and is available only for procedures in which the definitive award was made by 31 December 1992 at the latest. (17) A provision of domestic law under which the verification procedure referred to above may continue to be waived after that date is therefore manifestly incompatible with Directive 93/37.

15 The Court has already ruled in Costanzo that Article 29(5) of Directive 71/305 is unconditional and sufficiently precise to have direct effect and be relied upon by an individual against the State. (18) The same must be true of Article 30(4) of Directive 93/37, which is to a large extent identical to that provision.

C - Conclusion

16 I therefore propose that the Court reply as follows to the question referred by the Tribunale Amministrativo Regionale della Liguria:

Article 30(4) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts precludes domestic legislation authorizing, after the end of the year 1992, waiver of the procedure laid down therein for the verification of abnormally low tenders.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Tesauro delivered on 15 May 1997.
Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH v Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes - Germany.
Meaning of 'national court or tribunal' for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty - Procedures for the award of public service contracts - Directive 92/50/EEC - National review body.
Case C-54/96.

1 The question referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling in this case has been submitted by the Vergabeüberwachungsausschuß des Bundes (Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board, hereinafter `the Federal Supervisory Board') and concerns the interpretation of Article 41 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (hereinafter `the services directive'). (1)

The Federal Supervisory Board has asked the Court to determine whether that article means that the bodies set up by the Member States for the purposes of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 governing review procedures (hereinafter `the review directive'), (2) are competent, as from the final date for transposition stipulated in the services directive (and where no national implementing measures have been taken), also to review procedures for the award of public service contracts where infringements of the relevant provisions of Community law are alleged.

Relevant Community and national legislation

2 In order better to understand the point of this question, it is first necessary to place it in its proper legal context, by briefly looking at the relevant provisions of both Community and national law.

- Community legislation

3 Article 36 of the services directive lays down the criteria which a contracting authority is required to follow in awarding a contract. In particular, Article 36(1)(a) provides that, where the award is made to the economically most advantageous tender, the contracting authority must take into account `various criteria relating to the contract: for example, quality, technical merit, aesthetic and functional characteristics, technical assistance and after-sales service, delivery date, delivery period or period of completion, price'. In other cases, subparagraph (b) provides that `the lowest price only' is to be taken into account.

Article 44 of the services directive sets 1 July 1993 as the date by which Member States are required to adopt and communicate the necessary transposition measures.

4 The review directive requires Member States to take the measures necessary to ensure that award procedures for public works contracts and public supply contracts governed by the relevant Community directives (3) may be reviewed rapidly and effectively where the grounds of alleged illegality involve (directly or indirectly) Community law (Article 1(1)).

Following the entry into force of the services directive, the review directive also applies to procedures for the award of service contracts; Article 41 of the services directive, which the referring body is now asking the Court to interpret, amended the wording of Article 1 of the review directive to extend its scope to include the review of service contract awards.

5 Article 2(8) of the review directive provides that, where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions must be given. In such a case, the Member States must also guarantee that `any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body'.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

In order to ensure the independence of such bodies, the second subparagraph of Article 2(8) further requires that their members be subject to the same conditions as members of the judiciary as regards the authority responsible for their appointment, their period of office and their removal; and that at least the President shall have the same legal and professional qualifications as members of the judiciary. Finally, the subparagraph provides that the body in question is to adopt its decisions following a procedure in which both sides are heard and that its decisions are to be legally binding.

- The national legislation

6 The Community public procurement directives were transposed into German domestic law by means of an amendment of the Haushaltsgrundsätzegesetz (Budget Principles Law, hereinafter `the HGrG'). In particular, the Second Law Amending the HGrG, which came into effect in 1993, (4) inserted new Paragraphs 57a to 57c, which were intended by the German legislature to give effect to the directives on the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts, and to the review directive. (5)

The services directive, however, has not been transposed into German law, and this is confirmed by the order for reference.

7 Paragraph 57a of the HGrG constitutes the general legal basis for the adoption of the measures implementing the Community directives on public procurement. It confers power on the Federal government to issue regulations, with the assent of the Bundesrat, governing the award of public supply contracts, public works contracts and public services contracts, which are put out to tender by the bodies listed in the said Paragraph.

The ensuing provisions (Paragraphs 57b and 57c), which deal with the remedies available in the case of infringement of rules of Community law (or of national provisions transposing them), set up a two-tier review procedure for this purpose. Initial recourse lies to the award review bodies (Vergabeprüfstellen) whilst their decisions may in turn be challenged before the supervisory boards (Vergabeüberwachungsausschüsse) set up by each of the Länder, or, in cases where the impugned contract-award procedure falls within a Federal authority's province, before the Federal Supervisory Board.

8 Paragraph 57b of the HGrG regulates, in particular, the operation of the review bodies. According to subparagraph (2) thereof, the terms of reference of these bodies are to be determined by the Federal Government by means of regulations and with the prior assent of the Bundesrat. Subparagraphs (3), (4) and (5) contain a series of provisions concerning the commencement of the review procedure, the suspension of award procedures adjudged suspect and the information which applicants are required to provide to the review bodies.

Subparagraph (6) provides that the lodging of an application with a review body does not preclude the right of the individual concerned to bring an action in the ordinary courts for damages for loss suffered as a result of an award procedure.

9 Paragraph 57c of the HGrG lays down a series of rules applicable to the supervisory boards; (6) the members of such boards, the composition of which is regulated in detail in subparagraphs (2), (3) and (4) of this provision, perform their functions independently and on their own responsibility. In particular, Paragraph 57c(3) provides that certain provisions of the Deutsches Richtergesetz (Law on the Judiciary, hereinafter `the DRiG') are to apply by analogy to the official members of the supervisory boards as regards annulment or withdrawal of their appointment and their independence and dismissal. (7)

The supervisory boards review only the legality of the award procedures and do not examine the findings of fact on which the determinations of review bodies are based; they may, where appropriate, set aside the determinations of review bodies and direct them to make fresh determinations (Paragraph 57c(5)). Any person claiming that provisions governing the award of contracts have been infringed may make an application to a supervisory board (subparagraph (6)).

10 Finally, Paragraph 57c(7) lays down specific rules applicable to the Federal Supervisory Board. Its official members are selected from the chairmen and assessors serving in the decision-making departments of the Bundeskartellamt. (8) The chairmen of the chambers of the supervisory board are appointed from the chairmen of the Bundeskartellamt decision-making departments. The president of the Bundeskartellamt appoints lay assessors (9) on a proposal from the top public-law trade boards, decides on the formation and composition of chambers and exercises administrative supervisory control on behalf of the Federal Government.

This subparagraph also provides that the Federal Supervisory Board is to adopt its own internal rules of procedure to regulate the allocation and conduct of cases.

11 On the basis of the provisions described above, the Federal Government adopted two implementing regulations on 22 February 1994, after having obtained the assent of the Bundesrat. The first regulation, governing the award of public procurement contracts, expressly applies only to public works contracts and public supply contracts and does not therefore apply to public service contracts. (10)

The second regulation, however, is of general application and contains provisions fulfilling the obligation to provide for appropriate review procedures in the field of public procurement (hereinafter `the review regulation'). (11) Paragraph 1 of this regulation designates the bodies competent to conduct reviews in respect of each of the awarding authorities listed in Paragraph 57a of the HGrG. Under Paragraph 2, the review body has power to suspend the award procedure; its determinations are to be given in writing, contain a statement of reasons and be notified to the awarding authority and to the person claiming an infringement of the procurement rules; the review body must draw the latter's attention to the possibility of challenging the determination before a supervisory board and specify the supervisory board competent to hear such a challenge.

12 Finally, Paragraph 3 of the review regulation deals with the operation of the supervisory boards. It provides that the supervisory boards must make a reference to the Court of Justice under Article 177 when they consider that a ruling on the interpretation of the Treaty or on the validity or interpretation of legal acts adopted on the basis of the Treaty is necessary.

It also provides that the supervisory boards are to adopt internal rules of procedure in the light of the principles set out in the Law amending the HGrG. They must issue reasoned determinations in writing after having heard the parties. Finally, Paragraph 3(4) provides that the supervisory boards, unlike the review bodies, shall not be empowered to suspend a procedure for the award of a contract.

13 The rules of procedure of the Federal Supervisory Board came into effect on 1 August 1995 and have not been published. The version produced by the German Government in these proceedings consists of five sections regulating the organization and allocation of cases within the Board, the conduct of procedure, which includes a written stage and an oral hearing, and its decisions and other technical matters, including formalities relating to final determinations.

This version of the internal rules of procedure seems to be an amended version of rules which came into effect in June 1994 and was likewise not published. According to the Commission, which supplied this information without challenge at the hearing, there are a number of differences between the original version and the one now in force, in particular as regards the openness and necessity of hearings and procedural time-limits. (12)

14 To complete this survey of the legal background it should be noted that the transposition of the Community public procurement directives has been the subject of two recent judgments of this Court, in which it found that the German Government had failed to comply with its obligations under the Treaty. The first judgment concerned the incorrect transposition of the directives on the award of public works contracts and public supply contracts (13) and the second concerned the failure to transpose the services directive. (14)

As regards transposition of the review directive, the Commission has commenced enforcement proceedings which are still pending. (15) The Commission contends, essentially, that in the national measures transposing the directive the German Government has provided individuals with less judicial protection than the corresponding directive.

Facts

15 Unlike the legislative background, the facts which led to the main proceedings are straightforward and may be summarized as follows.

In 1995, the Bundesbaugesellschaft Berlin mbH (hereinafter `the contracting authority') issued an invitation to tender for the award of a general planning services contract relating to new government buildings in Berlin. (16) As the services in question were of an intellectual nature, the contracting authority opted to use a negotiated procedure with prior publication of the contract notice, as permitted by Article 11(2)(c) of the services directive.

16 Dorsch Consult Ingenieurgesellschaft mbH (hereinafter `the applicant') took part in the tendering procedure and submitted its tender on 25 August 1995.

The contracting authority examined the 18 tenders received and drew up a short list of seven. It then decided to award the contract to two of the other firms which had submitted a tender, which were required to form a working party to provide the services in question. The contract was signed on 12 January 1996, after the working party had already commenced its work.

17 The applicant took the view that the elimination of its tender constituted a breach of the services directive and of the relevant national legislation and applied to the Federal Ministry for Regional Planning, Building and Urban Planning (in its capacity as the competent review body) seeking, by way of interim relief, to have the contract-awarding procedure suspended and, by way of primary relief, to be awarded the contract. In support of its claim, the applicant contended that it had been repeatedly informed by the contracting authority that it was technically competent to perform the contract and that its tender was the most attractive in terms of price.

By letter of 20 December 1995, the review body declined jurisdiction and dismissed the application without consideration of the merits of the claim. The decision was based on the grounds that the federal regulation provided for under the legislation, by which the Federal Government was to have extended the jurisdiction of the review bodies to include the hearing and determination of disputes concerning service contracts, had still not been enacted.

18 In its notification to the applicant of the outcome of its application, the review body also informed it of its right to challenge the legality of the decision before the Federal Supervisory Board. The applicant thereupon made an application to that Board for the setting aside of the review body's decision to decline jurisdiction, the suspension of the contract-awarding procedure and the award of the contract to the applicant; alternatively, it asked for a reference to be made to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling on the point in issue.

The Federal Supervisory Board decided to stay the proceedings and to refer to the Court of Justice the question whether Article 41 of the services directive is to be interpreted as meaning that the bodies set up by the Member States for the purposes of the review directive are also competent, from the date by which the services directive ought to have been transposed into national law, to review procedures for the award of public service contracts.

Admissibility

19 Before considering the substance of the question referred, it is necessary to determine whether the Court has jurisdiction to entertain the reference made by the Federal Supervisory Board. From the foregoing survey of the legislation establishing the Board and of the rules governing its procedure serious doubts arise as to whether that body can be regarded as a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty and, accordingly, whether the reference is admissible. (17)

The issue was the subject of lively argument between the parties, both in their written observations and at the hearing. It is noteworthy that the applicant itself, which had expressly requested (albeit as an alternative relief) a reference to be made to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling on the point in issue, accepted that the Federal Supervisory Board does not constitute a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177; it submitted none the less that the Court should in any case answer the question referred to it, but - not without self-contradiction - on grounds relating to the effective protection of individual rights by the courts.

The Commission considered that the question was so clearly inadmissible that it felt it unnecessary to address its substance. The German Government, for its part, argued that the body in question does constitute a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177. But it explicitly conceded in the course of the hearing that it had begun the process of amending the relevant provisions to allow, inter alia, determinations of the supervisory boards to be challenged in the ordinary courts in order to ensure the effective protection by the courts of the rights of the persons concerned. (18)

20 My first observation in considering this issue is that, in German domestic law itself, the Federal Supervisory Board (as well as the supervisory boards of the Länder) are described as `quasi-judicial bodies' (gerichtsähnliche Einrichtungen) and not as courts or tribunals strictu sensu. (19)

This fact, whilst not being conclusive on its own since the concept of court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 is a term of Community law (20) within the audit of which the Court of Justice has seen fit (on occasion) to include bodies which were not so regarded in the eyes of their own national law, (21) none the less calls for a detailed analysis of the nature of the body in question and the manner in which it is required to carry out its functions, in order to ascertain whether it possesses those organizational and functional characteristics which the Court has in previous cases held to be necessary in order for a body which is not a court to still be able to fall within the scope of Article 177.

21 I shall therefore begin by briefly reviewing those leading decisions of the Court in this area which are relevant here, but it should be borne in mind that the case-law developed by reference to the individual cases that have come before the Court has not led to a general, exhaustive definition of the concept of court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177.

22 The first case concerned a Dutch industrial arbitration tribunal (Scheidsgericht) which made a reference to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling even though it stated that it did not consider itself to be a judicial body under Dutch law. In the now landmark judgment of Vaassen-Göbbels, (22) the Court decided that it had jurisdiction to rule on the questions submitted to it, having found that the referring body in question possessed the characteristics of a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177.

The Court expressly took the following factors into account: the Scheidsgericht was a body duly established under Dutch law; it was permanent; it was charged with the settlement of disputes and had to follow rules of inter partes procedure similar to those applying in the ordinary courts of law; it was required to apply rules of law; furthermore, all those belonging to the relevant industry had to bring any dispute with their insurer before the Scheidsgericht; finally, the members of the body in question were appointed by the Minister responsible, who also designated its chairman and laid down its rules of procedure. (23)

23 By adopting this approach, the Court thus made it clear from the outset that in deciding whether a referring body is a court or tribunal for the purposes of the Treaty it does not attach importance to its formal designation but considers its substantive characteristics (establishment by law, permanence, compulsory jurisdiction, transparent rules of procedure and the application of rules of law). This approach was entirely justified, especially in view of the historical context in which it evolved. For at the time of the Vaassen-Göbbels case the mechanism of cooperation between national courts and the Court of Justice had only just begun to operate and the Court of Justice was very mindful of the need to encourage the use of the mechanism in order to ensure the spread and uniform application of Community law, with the aid - if necessary - of a broad interpretation of the category of bodies entitled to make references to it.

24 A number of subsequent judgments should also be read in this light, like that in, for example, Broekmeulen, (24) in which the Court held to be admissible a question submitted to it by a (Netherlands) appeals committee which heard appeals from medical practitioners who had been refused authorization to practise or enrolment on the medical register. In this case, too, the Court found that the appeals committee possessed a number of organizational and functional characteristics which warranted it being treated as having a judicial function. The Court took into account the fact that the appeals committee concerned was permanent, that the public authorities were involved in deciding its composition, that it had internal rules of procedure providing for inter partes procedure, that its jurisdiction was exclusive and that its determinations were final. Given also the fact that it was called upon to apply Community law, which had been pleaded by the applicants in the main proceedings, the Court held that it was necessary, in the interest of the practical effect of Community law, to answer the question submitted.

25 The line of judgments beginning with Simmenthal (25) is to be viewed in the same light. In that case, a reference was made to the Court by the Preture di Alessandria in proceedings for an interlocutory order. The Italian Government contested the jurisdiction of the Court to reply to the questions submitted by the Preture on the grounds that the procedure was not inter partes, pointing out that the judge in question had power in the course of it to make a determination based solely on the plaintiff's submissions. Having found that the Preture was `exercising the functions of a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177', the Court held that the Preture's capacity to make a reference for a preliminary ruling could not depend on whether or not the proceedings in which the reference was made were defended; it did, however, add that `it may where necessary prove to be in the interests of the proper administration of justice that a question should be referred for a preliminary ruling only after both sides have been heard'. (26) In other words, the Court established that, whenever a referring body is unquestionably a court or tribunal, the fact that a reference is made before any inter partes hearing does not render it inadmissible.

26 While adopting this broad interpretation, the Court has none the less set clear limits to the concept of court or tribunal within the meaning of the Treaty. In its order in Borker, (27) subsequently confirmed in Regina Greis Unterweger, (28) the Court held that it had jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings only on questions submitted by a court or tribunal called upon to give judgment `in proceedings intended to lead to a decision of a judicial nature'. (29) The referring bodies in question in those cases were, respectively, the Paris Bar Council (which had been requested by a lawyer on its register to issue a declaration to be produced as evidence in legal proceedings pending before the courts of another Member State) and the Italian Consultative Committee for Currency Offences

(whose function was to give reasoned, non-binding opinions to the Italian Treasury), and in both cases the Court found that this condition was not satisfied. (30)

27 In addition, the Court subsequently held that, in order to qualify as a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177, the body making the reference must be independent. This criterion, perhaps because it goes to the very essence of the judicial function, was explicitly identified for the first time only in Corbiau, in which the Court declined jurisdiction on the ground that the body making the reference, although a court under national law, did not, in the Court's view, offer the necessary guarantees of impartiality between parties to disputes which it was called upon to resolve. (31) That case involved Luxembourg's Director of Taxation and Excise who had jurisdiction under the law to hear at first instance disputes between taxpayers and the departments (of which he was Director) which had charged them to tax.

The criterion of independence also appears to have been a key factor, albeit with the opposite result, in Asociacion Española de Banca Privada. (32) In that case the body making the reference was Spain's Tribunal de Defensa de la Competencia, which Advocate General Jacobs, in his Opinion, found to present a number of characteristics constitutive of a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177; these included the adversarial nature of the procedure which was clearly laid down by law, the independent exercise by its members of their functions and the fact that its members could not be removed from office. (33) In its judgment the Court did not specifically address the issue; but the fact that it replied to the questions submitted indicates that the Court implicitly endorsed the view of the Advocate General.

28 These decisions therefore clearly show that, even in the absence of a general definition of the concept of court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177, the Court has developed a number of tests which must be satisfied in order for a body to be entitled to make a reference for a preliminary ruling.

These tests concern the manner of establishment of the body, which must have been established by law and not by agreement between the parties; its connection to the exercise of public authority; its permanent nature, in the sense that it must not exercise a judicial function only on an occasional basis; its competence to resolve a dispute by a decision of a judicial nature; the conduct, before it, of a procedure analogous to that which is followed in ordinary courts of law, involving (within the limits discussed above) exchange of argument inter partes; the application by the body in question of rules of law (rather than principles of fairness); compulsory jurisdiction, which means that alternative remedies are not available; and finally independence, in the sense that it acts as a third party in relation to the parties to the dispute and that its members may not be removed from office.

29 To return to the case in hand, it is now therefore necessary to establish whether the Federal Supervisory Board possesses the characteristics allowing it to be regarded as performing a judicial function, as required by the Court for the purposes of Article 177 of the Treaty.

As already mentioned, the Commission takes the view that the Federal Supervisory Board does not satisfy any of the tests laid down by the Court in the cases referred to above. Its main argument is that the Federal Supervisory Board was established by a `framework' Law (the Second Law amending the HGrG), which does not impose obligations or confer rights on individuals and which must be supplemented by regulations; moreover, the body in question could easily be `deprived' of its legal basis - and thereby of its capacity to give judgment - in cases such as the present case where there is no competent review body at first instance. The Commission also makes these points: that the referring body does not make its determinations following an inter partes procedure, as is confirmed in the grounds of its first decision; (34) that its proceedings are governed by internal rules of procedure which have not been published and which may be amended autonomously at any time; that there is no legislative provision for its determinations to have binding legal effect; that it is not an independent body, since it is linked to the staff and organizational structure of the Bundeskartellamt, which is itself an administrative rather than a judicial body; and that the minimum term of office of its `official' members and of its chairman is not fixed by law.

30 In view of the nature of the Federal Supervisory Board, the legislative technique by which it was established and, above all, the provisions governing the way in which it functions, I must confess that I agree with at least some of the Commission's observations, which I also consider to be particularly important.

To begin with, I do not believe that the rules governing the review procedure before the supervisory boards can be regarded as comparable to the rules governing procedure before ordinary courts of law. On the contrary, the fact that, under the legislation, rules of procedure are to be adopted autonomously by each supervisory board, which may subsequently amend them autonomously, and that in addition there is no requirement that they be published, leads me to conclude that the degree of transparency and legal certainty required in any judicial process is not guaranteed here.

31 I am not only referring here to the absence of any inter partes procedure, which has now been proved in practice: of far greater significance, to my mind, is the absence of the minimal `functional' requirements which characterize judicial proceedings, as found in Vaassen-Göbbels. (35) In that case, as I have explained, the rules of procedure governing proceedings before the referring body were subject to the approval of the Minister responsible, so that there could be no doubt as to the certainty, transparency and ascertainability of the procedural rules applicable. That fact, which was indeed expressly mentioned was taken into consideration both by the Advocate General and by the Court in arriving at the conclusion that the body in question in that case was `bound by rules of adversary procedure similar to those used by the ordinary courts of law'. (36)

32 In the present case, however, I find it difficult to see similar procedural safeguards; if they do exist, they are subject to `opaque' autonomous amendment by the decision-making body and this seems to me to run counter to the most basic requirements of legal certainty. The point is borne out, indeed, by the Commission's doubts, referred to above, as to the version of the rules of procedure now in force due to the discrepancies between the version provided by the German Government in the course of the enforcement proceedings and the version produced in this case.

In these circumstances, I do not consider that the review proceedings conducted before the Federal Supervisory Board can be regarded as having the character of judicial proceedings as required by the Court. In this regard, the present case falls clearly outside even the generously broad parameters laid down in Vaassen-Göbbels.

33 There are also serious doubts, in my opinion, regarding the independence of the Federal Supervisory Board, at least as regards the question of unremoveability of its members from office.

Of significance in this regard is Paragraph 57c(7) of the HGrG, which I shall recapitulate for the sake of convenience: the `official' members of the Federal Supervisory Board are Bundeskartellamt department chairmen and assessors, with the former acting as chairmen of the chambers of the Board. The president of the Bundeskartellamt appoints the lay assessors, decides on the formation and composition of chambers and exercises administrative supervisory control by delegation from the Government. (37) The Federal Supervisory Board also uses the Bundeskartellamt's facilities and services.

34 In other words the `official' members of the Board are also members of the Bundeskartellamt and formally remain on its staff. In practice, this means that they simultaneously perform the functions of Federal Supervisory Board members and those of Bundeskartellamt members. Moreover, the legislation establishing the body in question does not include any provision as to the term of office of its `official' members, and the fact that the term of office of the lay members is fixed (at five years) (38) suggests that the omission was not inadvertent.

What all this amounts to, in effect, is that not only do the members of the Federal Supervisory Board enjoy no guarantee against dismissal, but neither do they have the assurance of a fixed term of office, which is an essential prerequisite of independence. On the contrary, they can be relieved of their `additional' duties and re-assigned to their `ordinary' duties at any moment and by means of purely internal organizational measures. While it is true, as we have seen, that some of the provisions of the DRiG regarding the permanence and independence of members of the judiciary apply by analogy to the members of the Board when acting in that capacity, (39) it is also the case that the latter are not covered by the DRiG provisions which give members of the judiciary the right to challenge their removal from office or re-assignment, with the result that they may be freely `dismissed' at any time by the president of the Bundeskartellamt.

35 Nor do I believe that the petitio principii contained in Paragraph 57c(3), which provides that the members of the Board are to be independent and unremovable, is sufficient to justify taking a different view, since it is contradicted by the fact that the Board members belong to the administrative authority and continue to belong to it, even from a functional point of view. Such a system, under which a limited number of administrative officials are, temporarily and for the performance of specific functions, given the title of judge and then made subject to an equally limited number of provisions applicable to members of the judiciary, but excluding the safeguards which ordinarily apply to the judiciary in relation to removal from office and re-assignment, appears to me to be too complicated and too intransparent to guarantee in practice the stability required to ensure the independence of those performing judicial functions.

36 One can have further doubts about the specific question of the impartiality of the Federal Supervisory Board in relation to disputes falling within its area of jurisdiction. This body is, as we have seen, part of the Bundeskartellamt, which is part of the public administration, but it is given power, in spite of this, to adjudicate in disputes involving public procurement awards, that is to say in disputes between the public administration itself and citizens. This fact alone would make it impossible to regard the Federal Supervisory Board as acting as a third party, thus independently. Unless, of course, one regards judicial independence as a moral quality of the actual persons who sit on the bench. (40)

37 Lastly, the Commission put forward a further telling argument with which I would agree. The legislation establishing the Federal Supervisory Board makes no provision concerning the legal effects of its determinations, especially their binding force. Since the body in question is one which, under national law, is not a court, the general principle that all judicial determinations are binding does not apply. So, in the absence of express provisions, the fact that the body in question was established using the so-called `budget solution', with the declared aim of not creating individual rights for those taking part in public tendering procedures, (41) gives rise to doubts as to the binding nature of its decisions. (42)

This is a factor which produces further doubts as to the judicial nature of the decisions which the Board is called upon to take and thus as to whether it can be regarded as having the attributes of a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177.

38 So, in view of all of the points I have made, I consider that the Federal Supervisory Board does not satisfy the requirements, certainly as far as procedural safeguards and guarantees of independence are concerned, for it to qualify as a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 and therefore that its reference is inadmissible.

39 It could be argued, on the other hand, that when a reference is made by a body which offers the only legal remedy available to an individual relying on Community law, the Court should accept the reference in any event, in order to prevent the applicant from being deprived of an effective remedy and to ensure the uniform application of Community law.

This is, in substance, the argument put forward by the applicant. As mentioned above, even though the applicant submits that the Federal Supervisory Board is not a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177, it suggests that the Court should turn a blind eye to this and nevertheless answer the question submitted by the Board on the ground that not to do so would be detrimental to the applicant. This proposal might be supported, it claims, by the judgment in Broekmeulen in which, as explained above, the Court accepted a reference from a professional body having the power to hear appeals concerning the registration of members of the profession and held, inter alia: `in the absence, in practice, of any right of appeal to the ordinary courts, the appeals committee, which operates with the consent of the public authorities and with their cooperation, and which, after an adversarial procedure, delivers decisions which are in fact recognized as final, must, in a matter involving the application of Community law, be considered as a court or tribunal of a Member State within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty'. (43)

40 I cannot subscribe to the applicant's argument; the ratio of Broekmeulen should not be stretched too far. The subjective and objective conditions for the functioning of the system of cooperation between national courts and the Court of Justice, which was created by Article 177 of the Treaty, cannot vary in accordance with the particular circumstances of each case. If a body is not a judicial body, it does not become one simply because there is no better solution. To hold otherwise and interpret Broekmeulen to that effect would mean conferring crucial importance on an aspect of the procedural system of which the body in question is part rather than on features of the body itself, so that it would no longer matter whether the requirements expressly laid down by the Court were satisfied or not.

41 In any event, even with the best of will to make concessions, the circumstances of the present case are altogether different in this respect. The decisive factor in Broekmeulen was, as quoted above, that `in practice' there was no right of appeal to the ordinary courts for a citizen relying on a point of Community law.

In the present case, however, a person who considers himself to have been unlawfully excluded from a contract-award procedure is expressly given the possibility of bringing an action in damages for any loss suffered, which in itself could well provide, at least in principle, a satisfactory remedy.

42 Moreover, even in the absence of any express legislative provision and despite the doubts expressed by legal writers, ordinary German courts seem to have come round to the view that they have jurisdiction to hear cases brought by participants in contract-award procedures for alleged infringements of the relevant provisions, including those of Community law. This is borne out by two recent decisions in which the Kammergericht (Appeal Court) of Berlin ruled admissible - before dismissing them on the merits - applications for interlocutory relief by tenderers who had been excluded from public tendering procedures and were seeking the suspension of the award procedures. (44)

Furthermore, as I have already mentioned, the German Government has notified the Commission that it has commenced the process of amending its legislation to bring it into conformity with the review directive; the new rules will make express provision for, inter alia, review by the ordinary courts of the determinations of the supervisory boards. (45)

43 So, as matters stand, it would not only be entirely in line with the case-law of the Court but also pose no problem for the effective judicial protection of individual rights, in the sense explained above, if the Federal Supervisory Board were held not to be a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

On the contrary, I hold the view that the solution which I have advocated, that is to say that the Court should declare that it has no jurisdiction to rule on this reference, offers a wider perspective going beyond the present case and affords a greater safeguard of individual rights, for which only a court of law can provide effective protection. Underlying this conclusion is, quite clearly, the conviction that only those bodies which are able to provide all the safeguards of individual rights developed by the Court can be treated as courts or tribunals for the purposes of Article 177, and no others.

44 Lastly, one final consideration, based on the underlying purpose of the review directive, should not go unmentioned. As is well known, this directive was adopted to meet a strongly-felt need to raise and make uniform the level of judicial protection of individual rights in the field of public procurement. In some Member States, neither the award itself nor the other related administrative acts were capable of being challenged in a court of law, or if they were, then with unsatisfactory implications for subsequent contract-award procedures. It was in order to remedy these very defects that the review directive introduced the obligation for Member States to put in place a system capable of effectively ensuring the vindication of the substantive rights conferred by the relevant Community instruments (the directives on public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts) on those taking part in public procurement procedures. This is the light in which the provisions of the directive should be read and, according to the Commission at least, in which the other Member States have implemented them until now. At the hearing the Commission produced a document providing an overview of the bodies to which the individual Member States have given jurisdiction in the matter of public procurement awards in order to transpose the review directive: the majority of Member States have designated the ordinary courts or, in those Member States where they exist, the administrative courts, subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the Council of State. (46)

This is a significant factor which, in my view, should be given due weight, whilst observing the distinction between this case and the enforcement action brought by the Commission under Article 169 of the Treaty.

45 Having regard to all the considerations set forth above, I propose, in conclusion, that the reference for a preliminary ruling should be declared inadmissible on the ground that the body which made it is not a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty.

Substance

46 On the substance of the reference, which I shall consider solely for the sake of completeness, a few remarks will suffice.

The question is, as I have stated, whether, after expiry of the period for transposition of the services directive, the review bodies are also competent to review procedures for the award of public service contracts in the absence of any express measure conferring such jurisdiction upon them (in this case, a Federal regulation, although this is provided for by statute).

47 Both the applicant and the German Government argue that, since the relevant provisions of the services directive must be regarded as having direct effect, (47) the bodies set up for the purposes of the review directive should also be able to adjudicate in disputes in relation to public service contracts.

Clearly, however, this is an issue which cannot be determined by the Court in these proceedings. For the Court may not take the place of the national legislature, to which the relevant power has been expressly reserved by law, and decide whether the review bodies should also review procedures for the award of public service contracts.

48 Relying on the direct effect of the provisions of the services directive does not change matters. Even if the Court were to find that the relevant provisions are indeed directly effective, this would merely mean that an individual had the right to rely on those provisions before a court; under no circumstances could it go so far as to indicate before which court that should be, for this would encroach on the domain of the national legislature. (48)

If an individual had no actual possibility of relying on a directly effective provision of Community law for want of a court competent to hear his case, this would, of course, indicate the existence of a clear violation of Community law. (49) Such a violation could, of course, be pursued by the competent authorities using the procedures provided for in such cases and could also bring into play the remedies which the Court has established in the area of State liability towards individuals who have suffered material loss as a result of the failure of the State in question to fulfil its obligations under Community law. But, to repeat, these are remedies which, both in form and in substance, are distinct from the procedure now in point and therefore have no bearing on the solution which I have proposed in this case.

49 In view of the considerations set out above, I therefore propose that the Court should declare the reference for a preliminary ruling inadmissible, on the ground that the Federal Public Procurement Awards Supervisory Board, which made the reference, is not a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty.

In line with its established case-law, the Court confirmed the breach of obligations by reference to the legal position existing at the expiry of the period set by the Commission in its reasoned opinion (in this case, 3 February 1993).

(14) - Case C-253/95 Commission v Germany [1996] ECR I-2423.

(15) - The letter of formal notice dated 31 December 1995 has been published, in German, in Zeitschrift für Wirtschaftsrecht und Insolvenzpraxis, N. 23/95, p. 1940 et seq. The reasoned opinion in the case was delivered on 29 July 1996 (see Commission press release No IP/96/614).

(16) - Published in the Amtsblatt Berlin of 23 June 1995 and in OJ 1995 S 120, p. 166.

(17) - The sole purpose of this examination is, incidentally, to determine whether the subjective conditions for acceptance of the reference are satisfied and not to establish whether the review directive was properly transposed, which may eventually be the subject of separate proceedings. Of course, the enforcement action brought by the Commission against the German Government for failure correctly to transpose the review directive, which I mentioned earlier, has points in common with the present case; but there are also many dissimilarities, so that a rigorous distinction between the two cases should be maintained, with regard to both form and substance.

(18) - This point was raised at the hearing by the Commission, which saw it as further proof that the supervisory boards as presently constituted are not courts; this was disputed by the German Government, which at the hearing argued that the amendments in question were aimed solely at making a number of improvements to a system already providing satisfactory legal protection, and it pointed out that this information had been supplied in the course of other, separate proceedings.

(19) - See the preamble to the Second Law Amending the HGrG, which inserted new Paragraphs 57a to 57c, discussed above (BT-Drucksache 12/4636, p. 12). The designation is not surprising if one has regard to the particularities of German Constitutional law. Were a fully-fledged Federal "court" to have been established by means of an ordinary law (such as the HGrG) this would have been in breach of the relevant Constitutional provisions (at least as regards the Federal Supervisory Board); this is because the German Basic Law (Articles 95 and 96) contains an exhaustive list of all Federal courts, any addition to which would require a constitutional amendment.

(20) - The definition of which, in the obvious interests of the uniform application of Community law, cannot be left to the discretion of the courts of the Member States (see in general Case 49/71 Hagen [1972] ECR 23).

(21) - See, for example, Case 61/65 Vaassen (neé Göbbels) [1966] ECR 261

(22) - Loc. cit., footnote 21.

(23) - In more recent decisions the Court also confirmed that employment arbitration tribunals which satisfy the aforementioned criteria are courts or tribunals within the meaning of Article 177. See, for example, Case 109/88 Danfoss [1989] ECR 3199, in which the Court found that the body making the reference, a Danish industrial arbitration board, had been established by law (which laid down detailed rules governing its composition, the number of members to be nominated by the parties and the manner of appointment of the umpire), had exclusive and final jurisdiction over the relevant disputes and could hear a case brought by either party irrespective of the objections of the other. Advocate General Lenz also pointed out that the board was also required to apply rules of law, such as the provisions of the relevant collective agreements.

(24) - Case 246/80 [1981] ECR 2311, discussed in greater detail in paragraphs 39 and 40 infra.

(25) - Case 70/77 [1978] ECR 1453, paragraph 10.

(26) - Simmenthal, paragraph 10.

(27) - Case 138/80 [1980] ECR 1975.

(28) - Case 318/85 [1986] ECR 955.

(29) - Borker (loc.cit. footnote 27), paragraph 4.

(30) - See also, on this point, the recent judgment in Case C-111/94 Job Centre [1995] ECR I-3361, which concerned voluntary proceedings involving an application for approval of a company's memorandum of association with a view to its registration. The Court held that the Tribunale di Milano, which made the reference, was in this instance performing the functions of an administrative authority rather than those of a judicial body.

(31) - Case C-24/92 [1993] ECR I-1277. There had, in fact, already been some fairly explicit references to the criterion of independence in previous decisions: see, for example, the judgment in Pretore di Salo, in which the Court had regard, among other factors, to the referring court's independence in reaching the conclusion that it constituted a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 (Case 14/86 [1987] ECR 2545, paragraph 7).

(32) - Case C-67/91 [1992] ECR I-4785.

(33) - Opinion of Advocate General Jacobs, delivered on 10 June 1992, [1992] ECR I-4806, paragraph 11.

(34) - Decision of 2 August 1994 (published in EU Public Contract Law, No 3/94, p. 47 et seq.), in which the Federal Supervisory Board stated that it did not conduct an inter partes procedure and that the parties' applications were only requests for a particular determination.

(35) - Of course, in attaching less importance, in Simmenthal (within the limits referred to above), to the specific requirement of inter partes procedure, the Court certainly did not intend to dispense with the more general requirement for the procedure to be of a judicial nature. It is in fact a fundamental requirement which played a decisive role not only in Vaassen-Göbbels, where it was expressly addressed, but also, as we have seen, in the reasoning underlying the other decisions of the Court on this issue.

(36) - See Vaassen-Göbbels (loc. cit. footnote 21), paragraph 1 (emphasis added), and the Opinion of Advocate General Gand in the same case, where he states: `The procedure which is followed (...) is of a judicial nature'.

(37) - This control is limited to reproach (Vorhalt) and reprimand (Ermahnung) and consequently, according to legal writers, should in no case concern the content of judicial determinations. The case-law appears to confirm this view, although there are exceptions in cases of purportedly manifest error. See also, in this regard, Paragraph 26(1) and Paragraph 26(2) of the DRiG, which are applicable to the body in issue and which provide that administrative supervisory control over the actions of members of the judiciary cannot limit their independence. Paragraph 26(3), which gives judges the right to challenge administrative supervisory measures addressed to them, does not, however, apply to `official' board members (Paragraph 57c(3)).

(38) - HGrG, Paragraph 57c(2).

(39) - See supra note 7.

(40) - See the judgment in Corbiau (loc. cit. footnote 31). It is true that in that case the referring body was linked to the very departments which had made the disputed tax assessment: however, the rationale of the Court's judgment (and of the Advocate General's Opinion) is not unlike the approach which should prevail in the present case, since the Federal Supervisory Board is, after all, an integral part of the public administration and thus is not a third party in relation to disputes between the administration and citizens.

(41) - See the explanatory memorandum to the Draft Amending Law to the HGrG (BT-Drucksache 12/4636, p. 12).

(42) - See the doubts expressed by legal writers, in particular by Boesen, EuZW 1996, p. 586, who points out that the decisions of the Federal Supervisory Board are not enforceable; see also, on the same point, the letter of formal notice and the reasoned opinion sent by the Commission to the German Government in the enforcement proceedings referred to above.

(43) - Broekmeulen (loc. cit. footnote 24), paragraph 17.

(44) - Kammergericht Berlin, decisions of 10 April 1995 (KartU 7605/94, EuZW 1995, p. 645 et seq.) and of 31 May 1995 (KartU 3259/95, NVwZ 1996, p. 415 et seq.).

(45) - I would point out that the legislative changes which are being enacted could mean that the ruling which the Court is now called upon to give will have only `historical' significance, in relation, that is, to the issue of admissibility, concerning the question whether or not the existing supervisory boards are entitled to make a reference for a preliminary ruling.

(46) - The Commission has thus declared itself satisfied with the transposition measures adopted by all the Member States (with the exception, of course, of the Federal Republic of Germany, against which it has commenced Article 169 proceedings).

(47) - Such direct effect, besides deriving from the sufficiently precise and unconditional character of the provisions in issue, was, it is argued, confirmed by the Court, albeit indirectly, in the judgment in Case C-253/95 Commission v Germany, where it was held that the German Government had failed in its obligation to transpose the services directive (see footnote 14).

(48) - See, on this very point, Case 179/84 Bozetti v Invernizzi [1985] ECR 2301, at paragraph 17, and the more recent judgment in Case C-446/93 SEIM [1996] ECR I-73, where it was held that `... it is for the legal system of each Member State to determine which court has jurisdiction to hear disputes involving individual rights derived from Community law, but at the same time the Member States are responsible for ensuring that those rights are effectively protected in each case. Subject to that reservation, it is not for the Court to intervene in order to resolve questions of jurisdiction to which the classification of certain legal situations based on Community law may give rise in the national judicial system' (at paragraph 32).

(49) - And, in all likelihood, a breach of Article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which enshrines the right of access to a court of law.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 16 September 1997.
Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria AG and Others v Strohal Rotationsdruck GesmbH.
Reference for a preliminary ruling: Bundesvergabeamt - Austria.
Public procurement - Procedure for the award of public works contracts - State printing office - Subsidiary pursuing commercial activities.
Case C-44/96.

1 In this case, the Court is asked to give a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of the term `body governed by public law' used by the Community legislature to define the scope of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (1) (hereinafter `the Directive').

2 According to the Directive, a `body governed by public law' constitutes a `contracting authority'; when a `contracting authority' enters into a works contract, the rules in the Directive apply to that contract.

I - The relevant Community legislation

Directive 93/37/EEC

3 Directive 93/37, which consolidates Council Directive 71/305/EEC, (2) constitutes the basic Community legislation in the field of public works contracts.

4 The Directive sets out the common rules applicable to the Member States in respect of technical matters, the publicity to be given to contracts which contracting authorities intend to award and the participation of contractors in the procedure. It lays down the types of procedure which must be followed by the contracting authorities when awarding contracts, and the information which must be provided by them to candidates, tenderers and the Commission, or by the Member States to the Commission.

5 Article 1 defines the main terms delimiting the scope of the Directive.

6 Article 1(a) thus provides that:

`"public works contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority'. (3)

7 The first subparagraph of Article 1(b) provides as follows:

`"contracting authorities" shall be the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or bodies governed by public law'.

8 `Bodies governed by public law', which are thus contracting authorities in the same way as traditional public authorities, are defined by the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) as follows:

`A "body governed by public law" means any body:

- established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

- having legal personality, and

- financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law, or subject to management supervision by those bodies, or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law'.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

9 The last subparagraph of Article 1(b) indicates:

`The lists of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law which fulfil the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph are set out in Annex I. These lists shall be as exhaustive as possible and may be reviewed in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 35. To this end, Member States shall periodically notify the Commission of any changes of their lists of bodies and categories of bodies'.

Directive 89/665/EEC

10 Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, (4) required Member States to take `the measures necessary to ensure that... decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible... on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law'. (5) Under Article 5, the measures necessary to comply with that directive were to be brought into force by the Member States before 21 December 1991.

Regulation (EEC) No 2052/88

11 The amended version of Article 7(1), entitled `compatibility and checks', of Council Regulation (EEC) No 2052/88 of 24 June 1988 (6) (hereinafter `the Regulation') states that:

`Measures financed by the Structural Funds or receiving assistance from the EIB or from another existing financial instrument shall be in conformity with the provisions of the Treaties, with the instruments adopted pursuant thereto and with Community policies, including those concerning the rules on competition, the award of public contracts and environmental protection and the application of the principle of equal opportunities for men and women'.

II - The national legislation

12 In its order for reference, the Bundesvergabeamt explains that when the Agreement on the European Economic Area entered into force on 1 January 1994 the Republic of Austria was required to transpose into national law the European Community acts specified in Annex XVI to that Agreement. The acts involved at that time were, in particular, Directives 71/305 and 89/665, cited above. (7)

13 It appears from the order for reference that those directives were implemented at federal level by the Bundesvergabegesetz (Federal Procurement Law, hereinafter the `BVergG'), (8) which entered into force on 1 January 1994. For reasons relating to the division of powers between the Länder and the federal State, other implementing laws were also adopted by the Länder.

14 A number of directives not mentioned in Annex XVI have since been adopted in the field of public procurement. The national court notes that they have not been transposed into Austrian law but `assumes, however, that the relevant provisions of the BVergG must now be measured against the provisions of the relevant European directives'. (9) The main provisions of the BVergG are as follows.

15 Paragraph 1(2)(3) provides that:

`This Federal Law shall apply to works contracts for pecuniary interest relating to

...

(3) the execution by third parties, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

specified by the contracting authority'.

16 Paragraph 3 provides as follows:

`(1) This Federal Law shall apply to the award of works contracts and works concessions whose estimated value net of VAT is not less than ECU 5 million.

...

(3) No works contract... may be split up with the intention of avoiding the application of this Federal Law'.

17 Paragraph 6(1)(3) provides that:

`This Federal Law shall apply to contracts awarded by contracting authorities which are:

...

(3) (Constitutional provision) undertakings within the meaning of Article 126(b)(2) of the B-VG, (10) in so far as they were established for the purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and the Federation holds a majority shareholding in those undertakings - as regards other undertakings subject to scrutiny by the Rechnungshof (audit authority), in so far as they were established for the aforementioned purpose, it is for the Länder to lay down the rules concerning the award of contracts and to ensure that they are applied'. (11)

18 The BVergG introduced two types of action: a conciliation procedure before the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission (Federal Procurement Review Commission) and a review procedure before the Bundesvergabeamt (Federal Procurement Office). An application for review by the Bundesvergabeamt must be preceded by the conciliation procedure. Only if it is not possible to resolve the dispute between the contracting authority and the candidates or tenderers by means of the conciliation procedure may the matter be referred to the Bundesvergabeamt.

III - The facts and the national proceedings

The Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei

19 The Austrian State printing office (Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei, hereinafter `the OStDr') was founded in 1804 and was originally a State undertaking. Since 1981, the OStDr has had a different status, pursuant to the Bundesgesetz über die Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei (Staatsdruckereigesetz) of 1 July 1981 (Federal Law on the Austrian State Printing Office, hereinafter the `StDrG'). Paragraph 1 of the StDrG reads as follows:

`(1) An independent economic entity is established with the name "Osterreichische Staatsdruckerei" (hereinafter "the Staatsdruckerei"). It has its registered office in Vienna and has legal personality.

(2) The Staatsdruckerei is a trader for the purposes of the Commercial Code. It must be registered in Part A of the Commercial Register of the Vienna Commercial Court.

(3) The activities of the Staatsdruckerei are to be pursued in accordance with the rules governing trade.'

20 The tasks to be carried out by the OStDr are laid down in Paragraph 2 of the StDrG. According to Paragraph 2(1), they involve sole responsibility for the production, for the federal administration, of printed matter requiring secrecy or security measures, such as passports, driving licences, identity cards, the federal official journal, the federal reports of laws and decisions, forms and the Wiener Zeitung. Those activities are collectively referred to as `public service obligations' and are monitored by a State control service. (12) Prices are fixed, at the request of the Director-General of the OStDr, by the economic council, (13) which is composed of 12 members, eight of whom are appointed by the Federal Chancellery or various ministries and four by the works council, in accordance with the rules governing trade. (14)

21 According to Paragraph 2(2), the OStDr may also pursue other activities, such as the production of other printed matter or the publication and distribution of books or newspapers.

22 According to Paragraph 3, `within the framework of its objects, the Staatsdruckerei may acquire holdings in undertakings'.

Strohal Gesellschaft and Strohal Rotationsdruck

23 In February 1995, the OStDr acquired the entire share capital of Strohal Gesellschaft (hereinafter `SG'), which set up Strohal Rotationsdruck (hereinafter `SRG' or `the defendant') in October that year, retaining OS 999 000 of its share capital of OS 1 000 000. (15)

24 It appears from the defendant's written observations that OStDr's acquisition of SG was based on the latter's experience in a printing technique not used by OStDr and on the existence of a client base situated abroad. (16)

25 SRG adds that it was registered as a company with the Landgericht (Regional Court), Eisenstadt, on 4 November 1995, its registered object being the production of printed matter using the process in question. (17)

The `Druckzentrum Müllendorf' project

26 In order to reduce the waiting period prior to the `Druckzentrum Müllendorf' printing works, for which SRG was to be responsible, becoming operational, OStDr entered into various contracts on behalf of SRG, which was then still in the process of being set up. (18)

27 On 18 October 1995 OStDr issued a call for tenders relating to the non-production technical installations of the `Druckzentrum Müllendorf', but subsequently withdrew it following a conciliation procedure initiated by the Wirtschaftskammer Osterreich (Austrian Chamber of Commerce).

28 A restricted call for tenders was then issued, and OStDr informed tenderers that SRG was the firm inviting tenders and awarding the contracts. (19)

29 A conciliation procedure was initiated at the request, lodged on 15 November 1995, of the Verband der Industriellen Gebäudetechnikunternehmen Osterreichs (Association of Industrial Construction Undertakings in Austria), on the ground that the project was a public works contract within the meaning of the BVergG, and thus fell within the scope of that Law. (20)

30 The Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission concluded that, in the absence of a contracting authority within the meaning of the BVergG, there was no public works contract and that the question therefore did not fall within its jurisdiction. It did not, however, exclude the possibility of the need to comply with the Directive if the entity awarding the contract was in receipt of Community funds, in accordance with Article 7(1), cited above. (21)

31 No amicable settlement having been reached, Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria AG, J.L. Bacon GesmbH, Haustechnische Gesellschaft für Sanitär-, Wärme- und Luft-Technische Anlagen GesmbH and Sulzer Infra Anlagen- und Gebäudetechnik GesmbH (hereinafter `the applicants') initiated a review procedure before the Bundesvergabeamt on 7 December 1995 in accordance with Paragraph 92 of the BVergG. (22)

IV - The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

32 The Bundesvergabeamt notes that the relevant provisions of the BVergG were adopted in order to transpose Directive 71/305, as amended, and that, in order to interpret those provisions, it is now necessary to refer to Directive 93/37. It has consequently referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

`1. Can a provision of a national law, such as Paragraph 3 of the Staatsdruckereigesetz in the present case, which confers special and exclusive rights on an undertaking, establish that undertaking as meeting needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37/EEC and make such an undertaking as a whole fall within the scope of that directive, even if those activities form only part of the undertaking's activity and the undertaking in addition participates in the market as a commercial undertaking?

2. In the event that such an undertaking falls within the scope of Directive 93/37/EEC only with respect to the special and exclusive rights conferred on it, is such an undertaking obliged to take organisational measures to prevent financial means obtained from earnings from those special and exclusive rights being switched to other sectors of activity?

3. If a contracting authority starts a project and that project is therefore to be classified as a public works contract within the meaning of Directive 93/37/EEC, may the intervention of a third party who prima facie does not fall within the personal scope of the Directive have the effect of altering the classification of a project as a public works contract, or should such a proceeding be regarded as an evasion of the personal scope of the Directive and incompatible with the aim and purpose of the Directive?

4. If a contracting authority establishes undertakings for carrying on commercial activities and holds majority holdings in them which enable it to exercise economic control over those undertakings, does the classification as a contracting authority then also apply to those associated undertakings?

5. If a contracting authority transfers funds which it has earned from special and exclusive rights conferred on it to purely commercial undertakings in which it owns a majority holding, does that have the effect that, regardless of the legal position of the associated undertaking, that undertaking as a whole must let itself be treated and behave as a contracting authority within the meaning of Directive 93/37/EEC?

6. If a contracting authority which both meets needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial character and also carries on commercial activities establishes operating installations which are capable of serving both purposes, is the award of the contract for constructing such operating installations to be classified as a public works contract within the meaning of Directive 93/37/EEC, or does Community law contain criteria according to which such an operating installation can be classified either as serving public needs or as serving commercial activities, and if so, which criteria?

7. Does Article 7(1) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 2081/93 of 20 July 1993 amending Regulation (EEC) No 2052/88 on the tasks of the Structural Funds and their effectiveness and on coordination of their activities between themselves and with the operations of the European Investment Bank and the other existing financial instruments make the recipients of the Community subsidies subject to the review procedures within the meaning of Directive 89/665/EEC, even if they themselves are not contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1 of Directive 93/37/EEC?'

33 Before dealing with those questions, it is necessary to consider whether the Bundesvergabeamt has capacity to refer questions for a preliminary ruling.

V - The admissibility of the reference for a preliminary ruling

34 The Bundesvergabeamt has described the characteristics which in its view justify its classification as a `court or tribunal' within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty and, consequently, the admissibility of the reference.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

35 Nor is that classification contested by the parties, the intervening Member States or the Commission.

36 Let me recall the criteria to which the Court has referred in its case-law for the purpose of recognising a judicial body: it must be established by law and have a permanent existence, there must be compulsory reference to the body in the event of a dispute, it must apply rules of law and have competence to resolve disputes by adopting a binding decision, its members must be independent and it must be bound by rules of adversary procedure. (23)

37 The Bundesvergabeamt was established under the first sentence of Paragraph 78(1) of the BVergG. According to Paragraph 91 et seq., defining its jurisdiction, it hears disputes concerning the procedures for the award of public contracts under the BVergG. There is no doubt that it was established by law, nor that it exercises binding jurisdiction.

38 There is nothing in the BVergG to suggest that the Bundesvergabeamt is in any way temporary. The fact that it was established by the law is evidence of the Republic of Austria's intention to create a lasting body responsible for hearing public procurement disputes with no temporal limits on its powers.

39 Furthermore, it is apparent from Paragraph 78(2), which recalls that the Bundesvergabeamt is to exercise the powers granted to it by the BVergG, and from Paragraph 91 et seq., concerning its jurisdiction, that it applies rules of law in adopting its decisions since it resolves disputes arising as a result of infringement of the BVergG.

40 Under Paragraphs 91 and 92(2) of the BVergG, proceedings may be initiated before the Bundesvergabeamt if the conciliation procedure, which is a compulsory preliminary stage, has been unsuccessful. However, in contrast to the decisions of the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission, those of the Bundesvergabeamt are binding as may be seen, inter alia, from the fact that it enjoys a power of annulment under the law. (24)

41 The independence of the Bundesvergabeamt and of its members seems indisputable. Its president and deputy president are professional judges, (25) the appointing authority must ensure that its other members represent a fair balance between contracting authorities and tenderers, (26) an exhaustive list is given of the grounds for revocation, which correspond to objective situations or, in the case of serious negligence, to omissions required by the Law to be so serious as to reduce the risk of arbitrary action or interference on the part of the administrative authorities. (27) I would add that the Law states that the members of the Bundesvergabeamt must be independent and may not receive instructions, (28) and that the administration may not vary or annul its decisions. (29)

42 The condition that it must be bound by rules of adversary procedure seems to be less certain, since the Law contains no specific provisions in that respect.

43 The fact that reference to the Bundesvergabeamt must be preceded by a conciliation stage before the Bundes-Vergabekontrollkommission, which must hear the parties, (30) ensures only that the rules of adversary procedure are observed before that authority and not before the Bundesvergabeamt itself. Furthermore, as drafted, the rule under which the Bundesvergabeamt may obtain any information from the contracting authorities and the contractors (31) does not in any way guarantee the right of each party systematically to be informed of the pleas in law and claims submitted by the other party since, according to its wording, information requested by the Bundesvergabeamt is sent only to that body. Yet in order to be effective, the rules of adversary procedure require the parties to be able to respond to their opponents' arguments.

44 However, in the present case, the order for reference demonstrates that these proceedings are the result of an inter partes hearing similar to that before a court or tribunal, since written pleadings were submitted by the parties and, although no mention is made of the exchange of those documents between the parties, a hearing at least took place before the Bundesvergabeamt. (32) Consequently, it seems clear that, in practice, the Bundesvergabeamt acted in every respect as a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the Treaty.

45 For those reasons, I conclude that the reference is admissible.

VI - The questions

46 Public authorities have a natural tendency, which is difficult to reconcile with the objective of completing the internal market, to favour national undertakings in order to maintain employment and to support economic development in their own Member State.

47 The Community public procurement legislation was developed to ensure, at Community level, respect for the principles of free competition, freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, which had long been disparaged by the widespread tendency to act in that way. (33) Its purpose is to ensure that traders, of whatever origin, have equal access to contracts put out to tender by public authorities for the execution of their projects, whatever form those authorities may take. (34)

48 The Directive must be interpreted in the light of that objective.

49 In order for a works contract to be a public works contract and, thus, for the Directive to apply, one of the contracting parties must satisfy the definition of `contracting authority' within the meaning of the Directive.

50 The scope of the Directive ratione personae is defined by reference not only to the bodies traditionally considered to be public authorities, such as the State, regional or local authorities and public sector undertakings but also to public or private bodies pursuing an objective in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, which are described as `bodies governed by public law'.

51 The questions referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling relate to the meaning of that expression. Most of the questions can be grouped together by subject-matter since they are closely related.

The first, second and sixth questions

52 By these questions the national court essentially seeks to ascertain whether an undertaking which devotes part of its activity to meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and the remainder to a commercial activity must apply the provisions of the Directive to all works contracts entered into by it or only to those relating to installations for use exclusively for the purposes of the former.

53 The question is not only whether an undertaking such as OStDr exhibits such characteristics as to justify its treatment as a `body governed by public law' and thus a `contracting authority' but also, if that is the case, whether all works contracts entered into by it, of whatever nature, are public works contracts and as such subject to the Directive.

54 None of the parties contends that the legislation applies selectively, depending on the activity carried out by the contracting authority. The applicants, the Commission and, in its oral observations on the sixth question, the French Government all consider that if an entity such as OStDr pursues commercial activities in addition to those activities for the purposes of which it was established - in the present case, meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character - the commercial part of its activities also falls within the scope of the Directive, since only the purpose for which the entity was established is relevant. (35) In the submission of the defendant, the Austrian Government and the Netherlands Government, the criteria referred to in the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of the Directive do not make it possible to treat OStDr as a `body governed by public law' and to subject any of its activities to the Directive.

The concept of `body governed by public law': concurrent legislative conditions

55 It must be borne in mind that the Directive applies to public works contracts which it defines as contracts one of the parties to which is a `contracting authority'; that term includes `bodies governed by public law'.

56 In its first question the national court uses the concept of `special and exclusive rights' to describe the special status of OStDr.

57 The concept of `special or exclusive rights', which appears in Article 90(1) of the Treaty, applies to undertakings which have a monopoly or enjoy a privileged situation recognised by, and in exchange for a situation of dependence vis-à-vis, the State. That article requires Member States to withdraw or to refrain from enacting measures contrary to the Community competition rules in respect of such undertakings.

58 Even though, as the Austrian Government states, `the production and publication of printed matter... takes place under "privileged" conditions ...' (36) which might justify use of the concept of `special or exclusive rights' to describe the tasks of OStDr, that expression does not determine whether the public works legislation applies, and is therefore not helpful for the purposes of interpreting the Directive.

59 The central concept here is that of a `body governed by public law' in the sense of a body `established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character'. (37)

60 There are two further conditions: a `body governed by public law' must have legal personality and it must be closely dependent on the State, regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law. (38)

61 It is clear from the wording of the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) of the Directive that the three conditions set out therein are cumulative.

62 The lists referred to in the third subparagraph of Article 1(b) set out the entities which satisfy the criteria in question.

63 The definition of the relevant Austrian entities refers to `all bodies subject to budgetary supervision by the "Rechnungshof" (audit authority) not having an industrial or commercial character'. (39) Article 15(6) of the StDrG provides that OStDr is subject to supervision by the audit authority. However, the other criterion laid down in that text, which is similar to the first criterion in the second subparagraph of Article 1(b), also needs to be defined.

Meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character

64 The expression `needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character' is not easy to understand.

65 The concept of `general interest' can be approached in the same way as Advocate General Van Gerven approached that of `general economic interest', in Article 90(2) of the Treaty, from the point of view of `... activities of direct benefit to the public', rather than the interests of individuals or groups. (40) From that point of view, it is logical to consider that the part of OStDr's activity devoted to printing official administrative documents such as passports, identity cards and law reports is intended to meet needs in the general interest.

66 In the present case, the greatest difficulty arises in drawing a line between the activities in the general interest which have an industrial or commercial character and those which do not.

67 In a different, although related, legal context (since it concerned relations between the State and public undertakings) the Court has laid down a number of criteria which make an attempt at delineation possible.

68 It has held that `... the State may act either by exercising public powers or by carrying on economic activities of an industrial or commercial nature by offering goods and services on the market'. (41) In another judgment it noted that `... private undertakings determine their industrial and commercial strategy by taking into account in particular requirements of profitability. Decisions of public undertakings, on the other hand, may be affected by factors of a different kind within the framework of the pursuit of objectives of public interest by public authorities which may exercise an influence over those decisions'. (42)

69 That description of public and private activities makes it easier to understand the type of area covered by the `bodies governed by public law' referred to by the Directive. The Community legislature intended it to apply to entities meeting needs in the general interest whose activities escape market forces, in whole or in part. Certain activities which by their nature fall within the fundamental tasks of the public authorities cannot be subject to a requirement of profitability and therefore are not intended to generate a profit. (43) It is possible that the reason why, in drawing a distinction between bodies whose activity is subject to the public procurement legislation and other bodies, the legislature used the criterion of `needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character' is that those of the second type are subject to competition from other traders which discourages them from selecting their contractual partners on the basis of discriminatory criteria. For that reason, the constraints imposed by the legislation therefore prove to be less useful.

70 In this case, the activity for which OStDr is responsible under the StDrG comprises the production of official administrative documents, some of which serve to identify persons and others to disseminate State legislation, regulations and administrative material; such documents are thus closely linked to matters of public order and to the institutional operation of the Republic of Austria. The specific nature of the needs which OStDr is responsible for meeting, which are thus linked to the exercise of prerogatives of public authority, explains the fact that its activities take place under conditions which largely escape competition since, on the one hand, it is in the form of a monopoly (44) and, on the other, even though they are fixed according to the rules governing trade, its prices are set by an authority which essentially forms part of the public authority. (45) The State must be able to enjoy both guaranteed supply and production conditions which ensure that standards of confidentiality and security are observed and which avert the risk of illegal reproduction of the printed documents.

71 I therefore consider that OStDr meets `needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character', within the meaning of the Directive.

The criterion of the purpose for which the body was established

72 Next it is necessary to determine whether the OStDr was established `for the specific purpose of meeting' the needs which it is responsible for fulfilling.

73 According to the wording, only the purpose for which the body was established is relevant in determining whether it should be considered to be a `body governed by public law', within the meaning of the Directive. What counts is, naturally, the objective actually pursued. A stated aim of meeting industrial or commercial needs, concealing activities in the general interest in order to avoid the restrictive rules of the law, could not be accepted by the national court.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

74 That condition means that the pursuit of such an activity must have been the reason behind the establishment of the body.

75 It is true that `specific' does not mean `exclusive', so that the body can carry out other activities without escaping classification as `a body governed by public law'. However, it seems necessary to establish that the body does indeed owe its existence to the pursuit of that specific objective.

76 If that is so, there will be evidence of the specific nature of its task, which justifies subjecting the contracts entered into by it to Community law.

77 Apart from the fact that it is not stated in the Directive, a criterion based on the relative proportion of the entity's activities devoted to meeting needs not having an industrial or commercial nature, as advocated by the Austrian and Netherlands Governments, (46) would appear to facilitate circumvention of the law. A body may very well have been established for the purpose of meeting public needs but in fact pursue activities of a purely industrial or commercial nature. If they are dominant in its activity, the suggested interpretation would mean that the body as a whole would no longer be subject to the rules of the Directive. It would therefore suffice for public authorities systematically to resort to such a practice to avoid application of the Community legislation to any public works contracts.

78 One must certainly not neglect the argument that extension of the application of that legislation to activities of a purely industrial or commercial nature is an onerous constraint and may seem unjustified since it does not apply to bodies established in order to carry out identical activities.

79 That disadvantage can be avoided by selecting the appropriate legal instrument for the objectives pursued by the public authorities. Since the reason given for the creation of the body determines the legal rules which apply to contracts entered into by it, those responsible for setting it up must restrict its objects if they wish to avoid the undesirable effects of those rules on activities outside their scope. They must also ensure that it evolves if, as in the present case, application of the public procurement legislation to those activities of the undertaking which are purely industrial or commercial in nature is considered too restrictive.

The legal nature of OStDr and the applicable rules

80 OStDr was created in order to satisfy the State's requirements for printed matter. (47) It has legal personality. (48) Furthermore, it is monitored by a State control service (49) and is subject to scrutiny by the audit authority (50) which, according to the statements made by the defendant at the hearing, can be accounted for by the fact that the majority of shares are still held by the Austrian State. Consequently, I consider that OStDr should be considered to be `a body governed by public law'.

81 Since the undertaking falls within that definition, all works contracts entered into by it are subject to the provisions of the Directive. Article 1(a) does not define public works contracts, and therefore does not determine the scope of the Directive according to the activity in respect of which contracts are awarded but rather by reference to the characteristics of the body entering into the contract with the contractor. I consider that this should form the basis for the answer to the first and sixth questions.

82 Consequently, the second question, which was raised in the event that OStDr was subject to the Directive only as regards its activities of a public nature, requires no answer.

The third, fourth and fifth questions

83 These questions relate essentially to the conditions to be satisfied by subsidiaries of a `contracting authority' in order to be considered to be `contracting authorities' in their own right and to the relevance of the involvement of a subsidiary which does not satisfy those conditions for the classification of a proposed public works contract commenced by a `contracting authority'.

84 More specifically, the national court wishes to ascertain, first, whether Article 1(b) of the Directive can be interpreted as meaning that entities falling within one of the following categories can be considered to be `bodies governed by public law':

- undertakings established by a `body governed by public law' for the purpose of meeting needs of an industrial or commercial nature, and in which that body holds more than half of the share capital;

- undertakings carrying out commercial activities, in which a `body governed by public law' holds more than half of the share capital and which receive from it financial resources derived from activities meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character.

85 In defining `bodies governed by public law' the wording of the Directive already takes into account a situation in which a legal person is financed, for the most part, by a public authority or by a `body governed by public law'. However, as we have seen, the three conditions set out in the second subparagraph of Article 1(b) are cumulative and it is therefore not sufficient that an undertaking has legal personality and is financed, for the most part, by `a body governed by public law' for it to be regarded as a `body governed by public law'. It must also have been established for the purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character.

86 The concept of `contracting authority' acquired a broader meaning in 1989 in order that the Community rules should not be restricted to legal persons governed by public law, (51) when numerous legal entities with powers traditionally forming part of the tasks of the public authorities in fact failed to satisfy that formal criterion. The Community legislature thus confirmed the approach in the case-law of the Court, which inclines towards a functional interpretation of the concept of `contracting authority'. (52) On the same basis, it does not include bodies which, although dependent on such an authority, carry out purely private activities. (53)

87 Consequently, neither the fact that the `contracting authority' contributes financial resources to an undertaking, nor economic control of the undertaking by a `contracting authority' renders it subject to the public procurement legislation, provided that its activities remain purely commercial. As the Austrian Government rightly points out, such a contribution falls rather within the field of the Community law on State aids. (54)

88 The Austrian court also asks whether the classification of a works project as a public works contract can be changed as a result of the intervention of a third party which is not a `contracting authority' within the meaning of the Directive, with the risk that such an approach might provide a means of avoiding application of the Directive.

89 The answer to that question requires the precise circumstances of the third party's `appearance' (`Eintritt') - the word used by the national court - in the execution of the project to be made clear.

90 It appears from the order for reference that the call for tenders at the origin of this case was initiated by the defendant, following OStDr's withdrawal of the previous call for tenders.

91 SRG is thus the contracting entity responsible for awarding the works contract in question. According to the national court, however, it does not exhibit the characteristics of a `contracting authority', which means that the Directive cannot apply.

92 As already stated, the fact that OStDr had already entered into previous contracts in the context of the same project was based on the desire to reduce the waiting period prior to SRG's printing works becoming operational, while SRG was still in the process of being set up. Furthermore, OStDr required the incorporation `into each works contract of a clause reserving the right... to assign all its rights and obligations under those contracts for services to a third party of its choice at any time'. (55)

93 The foregoing suggests that the project in question fell within the scope of SRG's activities from the outset, which casts a different light on OStDr's conduct since it was probably participating in the realisation of a project which fell entirely within the objects of its subsidiary.

94 It therefore appears that the works contract was not entered into for OStDr itself but, on the contrary, on behalf of SRG, which would justify such a contract falling outside the scope of the Directive.

95 The Bundesvergabeamt suggests that there is a risk that recourse may be had to a third party in order to avoid the Community public procurement rules, thus circumventing the law.

96 In so far as the scope of the Community legislation on public works contracts is defined with reference, in particular, to the status of the contracting parties, such a risk cannot entirely be excluded.

97 As already pointed out, however, it is for the court before which the dispute is brought to ascertain the truth of the reasons given for the creation of the body entering into the contract in question. Its assessment of the facts will determine the relevant legal classification. (56)

98 It is thus for that court to establish in concreto whether an undertaking was formed by a `contracting authority' in order to enter into works contracts for the sole purpose of avoiding application of the Community rules. The actual purpose for which the undertaking was established - in this case to enter into public works contracts - can thus lead the court to decide that the contract in question was entered into on behalf of the `contracting authority', which would justify application of the Directive.

99 The `contracting authority' may also opt to approach an existing undertaking. In this case, it appears to be more difficult to identify the illegal conduct if, as is likely, the undertaking selected is one not set up to pursue an activity designed to meet needs in the general interest not having an industrial or commercial nature, since contracts entered into by such an undertaking are traditionally not covered by the Community rules.

100 The court will verify that there is indeed a connection between the works envisaged and the undertaking's objects. It is clear that an undertaking which enters into a contract for the realisation of works which do not contribute to its own activities must be presumed to be acting on behalf of another. If a `contracting authority' can be identified as the beneficiary, the Community rules on public procurement will logically apply.

The seventh question

101 By this question, the national court is seeking to ascertain whether Community funding of a works project is conditional upon the recipient undertaking complying with the Community public procurement legislation even if that undertaking, in the present case SRG, is not a `body governed by public law' and is therefore not a `contracting authority'.

102 The wording of Article 7(1) of the Regulation might be interpreted in two ways. Either the Community must ensure that recipients of aid comply with the relevant Community legislation when it provides funding, or the Community legislation referred to in that paragraph becomes applicable to operators receiving those funds even though, in different circumstances, they would not be covered by it.

103 I consider only the first interpretation to be possible.

104 As worded, it does not state that the Community provisions relating to public procurement are to apply to all operators wishing to receive Community funding for the implementation of measures falling within the scope of the Regulation.

105 It refers to the `compatibility' and `conformity' with Community procurement legislation of measures in respect of which Community funding is sought. The requirement that the measures must be in conformity with Community law presupposes that they fall within the scope of each of the relevant Community acts. Measures taken by a body which does not exhibit the legal characteristics of a `body governed by public law' within the meaning of the Directive are clearly compatible with it since they are not subject to the rules contained therein.

106 The extremely general nature of the reference also supports that view. There is a risk that extension of the legislation to apply without distinction to all operators acting within the framework of action financed by the Community could result in difficulties in interpreting the texts which would be inconsistent with the principle of legal certainty.

107 Above all, application of the public procurement directives to bodies whose activities are purely industrial or commercial would be difficult to justify in the light of the purpose of that legislation which, it must be remembered, is to give economic operators equal access to contracts offered by public authorities or by bodies carrying out activities of a public nature.

108 The legislature's intention seems to be, rather, to ensure that expenditure incurred by the Community in the context of structural policies is strictly limited to operators who comply with the rules of Community law and does not sanction conduct contrary thereto.

109 Therefore, a body in receipt of Community funding which is not a `body governed by public law', within the meaning of Directive 93/37, is not bound by the provisions of the Directive relating to review procedures in public procurement.

Conclusion

110 In view of the foregoing I propose that the following answer be given to the national court's questions:

(1) Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts is to be interpreted as meaning that:

- a printing works having legal personality and established in order to have sole responsibility for the production of official administrative documents for the State, which controls it in particular by holding more than half of its share capital and which sets the prices for printing those documents, constitutes `a body governed by public law' within the meaning of Article 1(b) of that directive, even if those activities have come to form only a small part of its overall activity;

- it applies to all works contracts entered into by a `body governed by public law' within the meaning of Article 1(b) of that directive.

(2) Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37 is to be interpreted as meaning that an undertaking established by a `body governed by public law', which holds more than half of its share capital, for the sole purpose of meeting needs of an industrial or commercial character does not itself constitute a `body governed by public law' even if it receives from that body financial resources derived from activities meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character. The fact that such an undertaking enters into a works contract within the framework of a larger project originally led by a `body governed by public law' does not mean that that contract is subject to the requirements of Directive 93/37 unless the contract was entered into on behalf of the `body governed by public law'.

(3) Article 7(1) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 2052/88 of 24 June 1998 on the tasks of the Structural Funds and their effectiveness and on coordination of their activities between themselves and with the operations of the European Investment Bank and the other existing financial instruments, as amended by Article 1 of Council Regulation (EEC) No 2081/93 of 20 July 1993 is to be interpreted as meaning that undertakings in receipt of Community funding are not subject to the review procedures laid down by Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts if they are not themselves `bodies governed by public law' within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 93/37.

However, the defendant states that it initiated a call for tenders using the accelerated open procedure, which was published in the Austrian Official Gazette of 7 - 10 December 1995 and that it was in respect of that call for tenders that the applicants brought the proceedings before the Bundesvergabeamt which gave rise to the current reference for a preliminary ruling [p. 15 of the French translation of its observations]. (Needs in the general interest may thus be defined as the requirements of a community (local or national) in the interests of its members as a whole.) He adds that `il y a intérêt général dès l'instant que l'intérêt en cause ne se confond pas avec l'intérêt propre et exclusif d'une personne ou d'un groupement de personnes bien déterminé.' Furthermore, it appears that the decision fixing the prices must take account of factors relating to the specific task of OStDr. Thus, somewhat enigmatically, the StDrG states that prices take account of `necessary availability of capacity', which suggests that their level includes the costs incurred as a result of maintaining a sufficiently high production capacity to meet the State's needs, even if those production facilities sometimes remain underused.

(46) - In support of its contention that OStDr is not a `body governed by public law' the Austrian Government states, in particular, that `the proportion of "privileged" activities of OStDr represents no more than 15-20% of its overall activity' (p. 7 of the French translation of its written observations).

I would add, however, for the sake of completeness, that, pursuant to Article 2 of the Directive, bodies which are not `contracting authorities' may be subject to the provisions of the Directive if the contracts awarded by them are more than 50% subsidised by a `contracting authority'. The contract at issue must also be `covered by class 50, group 502, of the general industrial classification of economic activities within the European Communities (NACE) nomenclature' or `relat[e] to building work for hospitals, facilities intended for sports, recreation and leisure, school and university buildings and buildings used for administrative purposes' (Article 2(2)). That amounts to a derogation from the principle that the Directive applies to works contracts awarded by a `contracting authority'. If it intends to rule on the application of that provision to the case before it, the national court must consider whether the works contract at issue which clearly does not relate to the construction of buildings of the type listed in Article 2(2) falls within group 502 of the NACE, which includes, in particular, civil engineering undertakings. It must also establish the level of any subsidies paid by OStDr to SRG.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer delivered on 11 November 1997.
Federal Republic of Germany v Commission of the European Communities.
Approximation of laws - Construction products - Standing Committee on Construction.
Case C-263/95.

1 On 7 August 1995, the Federal Republic of Germany brought an action before the Court of Justice seeking annulment of Commission Decision 95/204/EC of 31 May 1995 implementing Article 20(2) of Council Directive 89/106/EEC on construction products (1) (hereinafter `the contested decision'), and requesting that the Commission be ordered to pay the costs.

The contested decision contained measures concerning the procedure for attesting the conformity of various product families. The applicant claims that the measures infringe Directive 89/106/EEC on construction products, (2) as amended by Directive 93/68/EEC (3) (hereinafter `Directive 89/106'), inasmuch as the decision by the Commission specifying the procedure for attesting the conformity of products fails to take account of a number of criteria laid down in Article 13(4) of Directive 89/106. The contested decision is therefore unlawful. It is further alleged that essential procedural requirements were infringed inasmuch as the Commission failed to comply with the time-limits for communicating the preparatory documents to the addressees, the contested decision was adopted in the absence of a favourable opinion from the Standing Committee on Construction (hereinafter `the Committee') and the statement of reasons was inadequate.

Relevant legislation

2 Directive 89/106, also referred to as the `construction products' directive, which was adopted by the Council in December 1988 and amended in 1993, seeks to remove barriers to the free movement of these products in the Community. The preamble to the directive states that there are requirements in the Member States relating, inter alia, to building safety, health, energy economy and protection of the environment that have a direct influence on the nature of construction products employed and are reflected in national product standards, technical approvals and other technical specifications and provisions which, by their disparity, hinder trade within the Community. The removal of technical barriers by means of essential requirements on safety and other aspects which are important for the general well-being must be achieved, without, however, reducing the existing and justified levels of protection in the Member States. (4)

Under the provisions of the directive, construction products may be placed on the market in Member States only if they are fit for their intended use, that is to say they have such characteristics that the works in which they are to be incorporated, assembled, applied or installed can, if properly designed and built, satisfy the essential requirements set out as objectives in Annex I thereto. These essential requirements - which must be satisfied during an economically reasonable working life and which generally concern foreseeable reactions - are grouped under the following six headings: mechanical resistance and stability, safety in case of fire, hygiene, health and the environment, safety in use, protection against noise, energy economy and heat retention. To take account of differences inter alia in levels of protection that may prevail at national level, classes of performance may be established for each essential requirement in the interpretative documents and in the technical specifications.

`Harmonised standards' refers to the technical specifications adopted by the European Committee for Standardisation (CEN) or by the European Committee for Electrotechnical Standardisation (Cenelec), or by both jointly, on the basis of a mandate from the Commission and pursuant to Directive 83/189/EEC. (5)

The conformity of a product with the harmonised standards is checked by means of a procedure for attestation of conformity laid down in Article 13(3). Under Article 13(4), it is for the Commission to specify, after consulting the Committee, the procedure to be used for a given product or family of products on the basis of certain criteria set out in that paragraph.

Article 20(2) states that the provisions necessary for establishing the procedure for attesting conformity in mandates for standards are to be adopted in accordance with paragraphs 3 and 4 thereof: the representative of the Commission must submit to the Committee a draft of the measures to be adopted and the latter is to deliver an opinion within a time-limit laid down by the Chairman according to the urgency of the matter, by the majority laid down in Article 148(2) of the EC Treaty in the case of decisions which the Council is required to adopt on a proposal from the Commission. The measures can be adopted if they are in accordance with the opinion. If they are not, the Commission must submit a proposal to the Council, which will act by qualified majority. If the Council has not acted within three months, the Commission can adopt the proposed measures.

3 The Committee adopted its rules of procedure in October 1989. Article 2 of the rules of procedure covers both the convening of meetings and the time-limits within which the working documents for each meeting should be received by the Permanent Representations of the Member States and their representatives on the Committee. Article 6 sets out the conditions to be met for a meeting of the Committee to be validly held and Article 9 contains rules relating to voting rights.

4 The decision contested by Germany was adopted by the Commission in May 1995 in order to determine the procedure for conformity attestation for certain products and product families: thermal insulating materials, doors, windows, shutters, gates and related products, membranes and precast normal, lightweight or autoclaved aerated concrete products. After determining the procedure, the European standards committees were asked to specify the system of attestation of conformity in the relevant harmonised standards. The contested decision contains three articles and three annexes, the contents of which are examined in more detail later.

Admissibility of the application

5 As a preliminary observation, I would like to say that the application is admissible. Under the first paragraph of Article 173 of the Treaty, Member States may challenge in the courts the legality of any measure adopted by the Commission. (6) The Court has held that such an action is not affected by the positions taken by representatives of the applicant State in the body responsible for the adoption of the contested decision. (7)

Pleas

6 Germany claims that the contested decision is contrary to Directive 89/106 because essential procedural requirements were infringed and because it violates Article 13(4) of the directive. I shall examine the applicant's pleas in that order.

A - Infringement of essential procedural requirements: delay in communicating documents, absence of an opinion by the Committee and failure to state reasons

On the delay in communicating documents

7 The applicant claims that the contested decision was adopted by the Commission in breach of the rules of procedure of the Committee, in particular paragraphs 6 and 7 of Article 2 thereof. The vote on the draft decision was on the agenda for the Committee meeting of 30 November 1994. However, not only were the documents to be discussed and voted on not received by the German Permanent Representation but the German version of the draft decision was sent by fax to the German members of the Committee on 11 November, a day late. The Commission's attention was drawn to this fact by letter of 29 November, in which the Head of the German Delegation on the Committee requested postponement of the vote for that reason. The applicant argues that those are infringements of essential procedural requirements which had a decisive influence on the attitude of the Federal Republic of Germany throughout the negotiations.

8 In its statement of defence, the Commission acknowledges the slight delay in sending the documents to the applicant, having sent them between 14.09 hrs and 14.23 hrs on 11 November. However, it argues that the English version of the documents was sent to all representatives on 10 November, that the latter had furthermore been in possession of the original draft decision since September 1994 and that the latter had been discussed at the twenty-seventh meeting of the Committee. It added that on 21 October 1994 the applicant had presented a counter-proposal drafted in German and English, which proved that it had detailed knowledge of the draft. The Commission argues that, in any event, the changes to the draft were small and of minor importance and therefore not sufficient to justify the applicant's claim that a half-day delay was capable of affecting its attitude at the time of the discussion and vote in the Committee.

With regard to the letter of 29 November 1994, the defendant argues that it was unreasonable for Germany to request postponement of a vote the day before the meeting, even though that is permitted under the Committee's rules of procedure. Moreover, if the delay really had caused the applicant such harm, it should have repeated its request at the meeting instead of approving the agenda without reservation, taking part in the discussions and voting, which led the Chairman of the Committee to believe that Germany had withdrawn its request. The defendant concludes with regard to the first plea that if there were procedural defects they were minor and in no way sufficient to justify annulment of the decision.

9 In the rejoinder, the applicant argues that the draft sent to it should have been in German and that the fact that the English text was sent to all representatives on 10 November is entirely irrelevant, especially in a case such as this where precise terminology was very important. It was only when the Commission had sent it the German text of the draft that was to be discussed that it was able to form a final opinion on the content, even though it had had relatively similar texts in that language before.

As for its request for postponement of the vote on the draft, the applicant maintains that it was made in due form as the Committee's rules of procedure do not specify a time-limit for exercising such a right. The request was repeated orally at the meeting on 30 November 1994, as evidenced by the sentence added to point 22 of the minutes of the twenty-eighth meeting when they were adopted; similarly, it did not approve the agenda either, and took part in the discussions with the other delegations because of its interest in the draft, not because it had withdrawn its request.

10 With regard to the sentence inserted into the minutes when they were adopted, the Commission states in the rejoinder that `the fact that this sentence appears in the minutes does not necessarily mean that the German delegation... refused to vote. In practice, subsequent additions of that kind which a delegation wishes to have included in the minutes are made by the Commission without examining their content since it would otherwise be impossible for the Commission and Member States to co-operate in a climate of trust.'

11 It has been established that the Commission did not send the Permanent Representation of Germany the text of the draft that was to be discussed and voted on, but that it did send the English version of the draft to the representatives of Member States on the Committee within the twenty-day time-limit. It has also been established that the German version was sent to the German representatives late and that the Commission did not postpone this agenda item to a later meeting, or postpone the date of the meeting in order to comply with the time-limit, despite the fact that Germany had duly requested it to do so.

The Commission's conduct was clearly in breach of the provisions of Article 2(6) and (7) of the rules of procedure of the Committee, which state that the draft provisions referred to in Article

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

20(2) of Directive 89/106 to be voted on must be sent to the Permanent Representatives of the Member States as well as to their representatives on the Committee not later than twenty days before the meeting is due to take place. If that time-limit is not met, the item on the agenda must be postponed to a later meeting unless, at the request of a representative of a Member State, the meeting is postponed to a date within the time-limit.

12 It remains to be established whether those breaches of the Committee's rules of procedure are sufficiently serious to be regarded as infringements of essential procedural requirements within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 173 of the Treaty, justifying annulment of the contested decision. To do so, it will be necessary to examine the purpose of the rules alleged to have been infringed and the possible impact of the infringement on the substance of the decision. (8)

13 Comparing the provisions in paragraphs 5 and 6 of Article 2 of the Committee's rules of procedure, I note that paragraph 5 imposes a time-limit of twenty days for the preparatory documents for a meeting and any other working documents to be sent to the Member States' representatives or alternates, with a copy to the Permanent Representation. In urgent cases, the Chairman may shorten this time-limit to a minimum of ten clear working days. However, the procedure laid down in paragraph 6 stipulates that draft provisions to be voted on by the Committee must be sent to the Permanent Representations of the Member States as well as to their representatives on the Committee not later than twenty days before the meeting is due to take place, no exceptions being permitted.

14 In my view, the difference between the two procedures is justified, as they fulfil different purposes. Paragraph 5 lays down the rules for sending preparatory documents for a meeting and working documents in general, while paragraph 6 establishes a stricter procedure for cases where the Committee has to vote on the adoption of certain provisions. Paragraph 7 sets out the consequences of failure to comply with the procedure in paragraph 6.

Paragraph 6 of Article 2 of the Committee's rules of procedure thus ensures that when a draft provision is to be discussed with a view to issuing an opinion the representations of Member States on the Committee have sufficient time to study it. If this were not so, there would be a risk - especially in instances involving standards such as those in the present case, which are highly complex and may affect different national sectors of administration - that the members of the Committee would not be able to assemble all the information required to vote in full knowledge of the facts. The fact that paragraph 7 provides for two solutions where the twenty-day time-limit is not met (the item may be placed on the agenda of a meeting at a later date or, if requested by a representative of a Member State, the date of the meeting may be postponed) confirms my opinion as to the importance of compliance with the time-limit in shaping the intentions of the Member States.

15 I would also state that this is not simply a case of there being a formal distinction between notices convening meetings in general and those convening meetings where there will be a vote on the adoption of certain provisions. There is another important difference, namely that where provisions such as those in issue, whose purpose is to define the conformity attestation procedure, are to be adopted the procedure that the Commission must follow to approve the draft depends on whether the Committee has delivered a favourable opinion.

16 When assessing the impact that this breach of procedure might have had on the content of the contested decision, I believe that it is irrelevant that the Commission sent the English version of the draft to the representatives of Germany on the Commission within the twenty-day time-limit. Article 3 of Council Regulation No 1 (9) requires that documents which the institutions send to a Member State be drafted in the language of that State. Compliance with that obligation assumes special importance in this case because under Article 19(2) of Directive 89/106 the two representatives of each Member State may be accompanied by experts. While the Commission may assume that officials from the Permanent Representation of Germany have good knowledge of English, I think that it would be going too far to presume the same for the two representatives of that country on the Committee, or indeed for the experts.

17 I also consider that it is irrelevant in this context that, as alleged by the Commission, the applicant had taken part in previous meetings during which the original draft decision had been discussed and that the changes made to the draft as a result of those discussions were small and of minor importance. In fact, the number and, above all, the extent of the changes could only be appreciated by the representatives on the Committee and by the experts once they had received the German version of the text to be discussed and voted on on 30 November 1994 and, as I said, this was received late. Even though the delay was minor, I believe that the applicant's claim that it was capable of affecting its attitude at the time of the discussion and vote in the Committee is well founded.

18 The applicant is also right in claiming that its request to have the meeting postponed was made in due form and that the Commission ought to have granted it. The rules of procedure do not specify a time-limit within which Member States must exercise this option. Moreover, the fact that Germany requested postponement on the day before the meeting is, in my view, sufficient indication that the delay in sending the text in German was clearly at that time making it difficult to prepare adequately for the meeting on the date it was due to take place. It is therefore unnecessary to ascertain whether Germany orally repeated its request for postponement of the meeting or vote on 30 November 1994, especially since the only way to do so would be to consult the minutes of the meeting, in respect of which the Commission has stated that the sentence confirming this was added at Germany's request and that in practice subsequent additions of that kind which a delegation wishes to have included in the minutes are made without examining their content.

19 For the reasons I have given, I consider that the Commission's breach of the procedure laid down in Article 2(6) and (7) of the rules of procedure of the Committee must be considered to be an infringement of an essential procedural requirement within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 173 of the Treaty.

On the absence of an opinion by the Committee

20 Germany claims that the contested decision was adopted in breach of Article 20(2) to (4) of Directive 89/106 inasmuch as the vote on the draft at the meeting on 30 November did not have the majority required by the third sentence of Article 20(3), which states that the opinion must be delivered by the majority laid down in Article 148(2) of the Treaty in the case of decisions which the Council is required to adopt on a proposal from the Commission. As no opinion was delivered, the Commission ought to have immediately submitted a proposal to the Council. Contrary to what is stated in the minutes, the Committee did not adopt any decision on the draft in question at the meeting on 30 November 1994. Some delegations did not give it their final approval and expressed reservations concerning the possibility of contracting authorities imposing a stricter procedure. The Netherlands Delegation expressed a reservation concerning the inclusion in the mandates of requirements relating to environmental protection. The Commission read out two declarations on those points and the Chairman gave the delegations time to review those issues before giving a final response. Point 41 of the minutes of the meeting states that the positive votes were to be confirmed within fourteen days of receipt of the text of the two declarations. Since the vote at the meeting did not have the required majority and the Committee's rules of procedure do not specify a written procedure for making decisions, the applicant considers that the contested decision was not validly adopted.

21 The view of the Commission on this subject, based on the minutes of the meeting, is that the required majority did vote in favour of adopting the draft and that, while it is true that four delegations expressed a `reservation pending examination', this has no effect on the agreement that they expressed on 30 November 1994. It explains that, as some delegations had voiced their doubts on that day as to the relationship between Directive 89/106, the directive on public contracts (10) and the directive on dangerous substances, (11) in order to provide an immediate response the Commission, represented by Directorate-General III, read out two declarations, with the proviso that the final texts still had to be discussed with Directorate-General XV and with the Legal Service before they were notified to Member States. Six States approved the draft unreservedly and a further four also voted for it, but subject to the reservation that they would confirm their vote after receiving the final version of the declarations, which they did.

The Commission further states that although a written procedure for adopting deliberations is not expressly provided for in the Committee's rules of procedure they do not prohibit it, and such a procedure, which is now part of the range of procedures used by the Commission (12) and by the Council, (13) has been systematically incorporated into the rules of procedure adopted by recently-created committees in accordance with the `Comitology Decision'. (14) In any case, those present at the meeting agreed to proceed thus; the applicant's disagreement was only expressed in the letters of 22 December 1994 and 19 January 1995 and, while it is true that there is a reference to that effect in point 41 of the minutes, the sentence was apparently added at the time of adoption of the minutes without Germany having made any reference to it or request in that respect on the day of the meeting.

Finally, the Commission argues that even if no decision was adopted on 30 November 1994 or under the subsequent written procedure the failure was remedied on 29 May 1995 by the adoption of the minutes, to which were annexed the final versions of the Commission's declarations, and that it was irrelevant in that respect that the adoption of the contested decision was not mentioned in the agenda for the twenty-ninth meeting because it was the definitive record of the result of a vote that had commenced on 30 November, when that item was on the agenda.

22 I agree with the applicant that when the draft decision was put to the vote on 30 November 1994, it did not achieve the majority required under Article 20(3) of Directive 89/106. In fact, according to the minutes - and none of the parties contests this - the Chairman recorded the following result regarding the delegations' views on giving an opinion on the draft decision:

`I Yes, and would later give opinion on the content of the two declarations: I, E, DK, P, UK, L.

II Yes, subject to a reservation on the examination of the two declarations to be made by the Commission: F, GR, IRL, NL.

III No: D, B (with certain nuances).

For the new Member States, AU was towards group III with SWE and FIN in group I.'

23 The Commission argues that the voting was valid, primarily because it was simply a case of confirming the positive vote a posteriori, and alternatively because the procedure followed was partially written, a method not prohibited by the Committee's rules of procedure and often used by the Council and Commission.

24 In November 1994, the majority required to adopt the decision was 54 votes. According to my calculations, there were 15 votes against and 38 for. There were also 23 votes in favour subject to the outcome of examination of the two declarations to be made by the Commission. It is clear that whether there was a majority in favour of adopting the draft decision and, consequently, whether the draft was in fact approved depends on how those latter votes are to be counted.

25 Unlike the Commission, I do not think that it is possible to consider as final the favourable vote by the four Member States who reserved the right to confirm their vote after having examined the two declarations read out by the Commission at the meeting, the final content of which still had to be discussed with Directorate-General XV and with the Legal Service. This was not simply a case of making the vote conditional upon receiving the text of the declarations; the reservation clearly referred to examining the content, which would very probably have to be amended. It was therefore possible that at least one of these delegations would no longer be willing to confirm its vote once the final text had been examined. On that basis, it is my view that the required majority of votes in favour of adopting the draft was not achieved at the meeting called for that purpose on 30 November 1994.

26 Should the procedure followed after the meeting, described by the Commission as `partially written', nevertheless be regarded as valid because the four Member States ultimately confirmed their initial vote?

27 I believe that the reply must still be no, for various reasons that I will explain below.

First, the provisions governing voting within the Committee seem to indicate that the vote should be held at the meeting, and not after or outside it. Article 6 of the Committee's rules of procedure, which deals with the quorum required at meetings, states that at least seven Member States must be represented. (15) However, in the case of opinions, it refers to Article 9, under which the quorum is to be calculated using the weighting laid down in Article 148 of the Treaty; only the representatives or alternates designated by Member States are entitled to vote and a Member State may, where necessary, represent only one other Member State. In my view, all those provisions point to the interpretation that I propose. (16)

Second, the Committee's rules of procedure do not provide for voting by the so-called written procedure. Admittedly, the rules of procedure of the Council and Commission provide for a procedure of this type for the adoption of agreements by those collegiate bodies, and the procedure laid down in Article 20(3) and (4) of the directive is the same as Procedure III, variant a), of the Comitology Decision. However, neither the Comitology Decision adopted in 1987 nor Directive 89/106 mentions the written procedure as a method of adopting agreements by the committees set up under those texts, and the Committee's rules of procedure, adopted in 1989, do not refer to any other internal rules which might also be applicable, specifying a procedure of this type.

28 I also consider it irrelevant whether or not the delegations agreed to follow such a procedure on this occasion. As the Committee's rules of procedure were adopted at the time by the Member States, I consider that they are all bound by them to the same degree and that no exceptions to those provisions can be made in the absence of a formal amendment thereto. That interpretation is based on the one given by the Court in respect of the Council's obligation to comply with its own rules of procedure, in a case concerning the possible infringement of an essential procedural requirement where a directive was adopted by the written procedure despite the opposition of two States to that method, and the Council's rules of procedure required the consent of all members before such a procedure could be used. The Court held that `the Council is... under a duty to comply with the procedural rule which it itself laid down in Article 6(1) of its Rules of Procedure. It cannot depart from that rule, even on the basis of a larger majority than is laid down for the adoption or amendment of the Rules of Procedure, unless it formally amends those rules'. (17)

29 That ruling removes the need for me to examine whether all the delegations agreed to proceed in such a manner or whether the German Delegation expressed its opposition on the actual day of the meeting; there is in fact a difference of opinion between the parties on this point that it is impossible to settle by referring to the minutes of the meeting, the obstacle being again the Commission's statement that the relevant sentence was added to the minutes at the request of Germany and that it did not correspond to the facts.

30 Finally, I will examine the Commission's argument that even if the decision was not adopted on 30 November 1994 or under a written procedure the unanimous adoption on 29 May 1995 of the minutes of the meeting held on 30 November of the previous year must have dispelled any uncertainty about the vote on the draft.

I must say that I consider this argument less likely to succeed than the previous ones, given the low credibility that can be attached to the minutes of these meetings in the light of the Commission's explanations about their drafting and approval. In any event, there are two reasons for rejecting the Commission's argument on this point. First, if the opinion was not adopted on 30 November 1994 and it was not possible to use the written procedure, the vote ought to have taken place at the meeting where it appeared on the agenda, which was not the case at the meeting held on 29 May 1995; second, if the Commission claims that the final adoption of the draft occurred on the latter date, then it should state how and when the three Member States that acceded in the meantime voted.

31 For those reasons, I consider that the plea of absence of an opinion by the Committee is also well founded.

On the failure to state reasons

32 The applicant claims that the contested decision is void for breach of the duty to state reasons laid down in Article 190 of the Treaty. The applicant considers that despite being an addressee of the decision and having participated in its preparation, it is unable to ascertain how the Commission took into consideration each of the essential characteristics of the products. Its claim is based on the following grounds: first, as the contested decision was the first to be adopted in its field, no comparisons with previous decisions can be made to clarify the reasons for the decision; second, as a statement of reasons for the decision the Commission merely reproduced the text of Directive 89/106, which was not sufficient to meet the requirements laid down by Article 190 of the Treaty; third, the Commission did not explain to Member States why it had not included some of the essential requirements listed in Annex I of Directive 89/106. Finally, the Commission also failed to explain why the initial type-testing of the product had to be limited to checking certain properties.

33 The Commission contends that, although brief, the reasoning is adequate given the nature of the measure and the context in which it was adopted, and that any attempt to provide a more detailed statement of reasons would have been swamped by technical details concerning products and product families. The essential element of the decision lay in the choice between the two procedures for attesting the conformity of a product and was contained in Articles 1 and 2 of the decision, combined with Annexes 1 and 2, while Article 3 played only a secondary role. The Commission also states that the Member States were closely involved in the drafting of the measure and were aware of the considerations on which it was based, which was a further justification for the brevity of the reasons.

34 Article 190 of the Treaty provides that the regulations, directives and decisions of the Council and Commission must state the reasons on which they are based and refer to any proposals or opinions that were required to be obtained under the Treaty. However, it does not indicate the scope or limits of the duty to state reasons; these are to be found in the decisions of the Court.

35 It is settled case-law that `the statement of reasons required by Article 190 of the Treaty must show clearly and unequivocally the reasoning of the institution which enacted the measure so as to inform the persons concerned of the justification for the measure adopted and to enable the Court to exercise its powers of review. It is not necessary, however, for details of all relevant factual and legal aspects to be given, in so far as the question whether the statement of the grounds for a decision meets the requirements of Article 190 of the Treaty must be assessed with regard not only to its wording but also to its context and to all the legal rules governing the matter in question'. (18) The Court has also observed that `the statement of the reasons on which regulations are based is not required to specify the often very numerous and complex matters of fact or of law dealt with in the regulations, provided that the latter fall within the general scheme of the body of measures of which they form part. Consequently, if the contested measure clearly discloses the essential objective pursued by the institution, it would be excessive to require a specific statement of reasons for each of the technical choices made by the institution.' (19)

36 The fact that the applicant Member State was involved in drawing up the contested decision has sometimes been considered by the Court to be sufficient reason to reject the plea of failure to state reasons. This can be illustrated by various judgments in which the Court held that `... it is not necessary... for details of all relevant factual and legal aspects to be given, in so far as the question whether the statement of the grounds for a decision meets the requirements of Article 190 of the Treaty must be assessed with regard not only to its wording but also to its context and to all the legal rules governing the matter in question... This is a fortiori the case where the Member States have been closely associated with the process of drafting the contested measure and are thus aware of the reasons underlying that measure'. (20)

The opposing viewpoint can be illustrated by an example drawn from a 1983 judgment in which the Court held that `... by imposing upon the Commission the obligation to state reasons for its decisions, Article 190 is not taking mere formal considerations into account but seeks to give an opportunity to the parties of defending their rights, to the Court of exercising its power of review, and to Member States and to all interested nationals of ascertaining the circumstances in which the Commission has applied the Treaty. Thus it is not sufficient that the Member States, as addressees of the decision, are aware of the reasons as a result of their participation in the preliminary procedure and that the applicant, the person directly and individually concerned, is able to deduce these reasons by comparing the decision in question with similar earlier decisions. It is further necessary that the applicant should be enabled in practice to defend its rights and the Court should be able effectively to exercise its power of review on the basis of the statement of reasons.' (21)

37 It is true, as the Commission concedes, that the statement of reasons for the contested decision is brief. It is therefore necessary to see whether, having regard to the context and to the legal rules governing the matter in question, the reasons clearly and unequivocally reflect the reasoning of the Commission, which enacted the contested decision, and enable the persons concerned to know the justification for the measure and the Court to exercise its power of review.

38 Two procedures for attestation of conformity are laid down in Article 13(3) of Directive 89/106. In one, the manufacturer ensures that its products conform to the relevant technical specifications, while in the other an approved certification body is also involved. The procedure to be applied is chosen by the Commission on the basis of certain criteria listed in Article 13(4), which include the importance of the part played by the product with respect to the essential requirements, in particular those relating to health and safety. The essential requirements are described in Annex I. The Commission also specifies the procedure for attestation of conformity of construction products in the mandates that it gives to the European standardisation bodies.

39 The contested decision is in fact the first to have been adopted by the Commission for the purpose of specifying the conformity attestation procedure applicable to certain families of construction products. (22) Leaving aside the preamble, which simply cites the texts of certain articles of Directive 89/106, the decision contains three articles and three annexes. Article 1 states that the attestation of conformity of the products set out in Annex 1 is by means of a procedure whereby the manufacturer alone is responsible for a factory production control system ensuring that the product is in conformity with the relevant technical specifications, whilst Article 2 states that the attestation of conformity of the products set out in Annex 2 is by means of a procedure whereby, in addition to a factory production control system operated by the manufacturer, an approved certification body is involved in assessment and surveillance of production control or of the product itself.

Annexes 1 and 2 essentially contain lists of the products concerned.

Article 3 states that the conformity attestation procedure set out in Annex 3 is given in the mandates for standards. Annex 3 defines a total of eleven product families, devoting two sections to each. In the first section, CEN and Cenelec are requested to specify, for each product and use indicated, the system of attestation of conformity that is assigned to it in the relevant harmonised standards. The second section contains two paragraphs. The first (2.1) lays down certain conditions to be applied by CEN in the specifications of the conformity attestation system. The second (2.2) contains instructions addressed to the approved body whereby that body must, in the case of certain systems, restrict itself in the initial type-testing of the product to checking certain characteristics, these being different for each product family.

40 I believe that in the light of the context and the relevant legal rules the statement of reasons in the preamble to the contested decision may be regarded as adequate in respect of both its provisions and Annexes 1, 2 and 3, points 1 and 2.1. However, in the case of point 2.2 of Annex 3, the contested decision gives no reasons and no indication at all why the Commission decided that, when performing the initial type-testing of the product, which is a method of checking compliance common to all certification systems, the approved body must restrict itself to checking certain characteristics of the product only, to the exclusion of others.

41 I am quite ready to agree that it would be unreasonable to require specific reasons for each of the decisions of a technical nature adopted in the contested measure. However, I consider that the absence of even the slightest indication of the reasons which led the Commission to impose this restriction prevents those concerned from knowing the justification for the measure and leaves the Court unable to exercise its power of review.

42 For those reasons I consider that the plea of failure to state reasons is also well founded.

43 The fact that the contested decision is flawed by these substantive procedural defects is sufficient to justify its annulment. However, for the sake of completeness, and in case the Court does not endorse my assessment, I will now examine the plea of breach of Community law.

B - Infringement of Article 13(4) of Directive 89/106

44 The applicant argues that when the Commission chooses the procedure for attestation of conformity it must also indicate the characteristics of the product that must be checked during the initial type-testing carried out by an approved body. When the procedure to be followed is specified, the relevant essential requirements must be set out in the Commission's decision, according to their importance for the procedure. The contested decision contains only an incomplete list of the relevant characteristics of the product, however. The Commission did not specify what other procedure would be used to examine the essential requirements excluded from the decision, as well as the important characteristics of the product. To sum up, the allegations by the German Government against the Commission are, first, that when specifying the initial type-testing conditions, only some aspects of health protection were included in the decision, whereas they appear in Article 13(4)(a) of Directive 89/106, and, second, that the essential requirement concerning health and protection of the environment was not taken into account at all for some product families and only selectively and incompletely for others.

45 The Commission argues that the applicant has misunderstood the relationship between the mandates for standards and the procedures for attestation of conformity, as well as the factors to be taken into account when implementing these procedures. The mandates that the Commission has to give to European standards bodies specify the characteristics of the product for which harmonised standards are to be developed in order to ensure that it is fit for its intended purpose, such fitness having to be measured against the yardstick of the essential requirements. In contrast, the procedures for attestation of conformity focus on the importance of the part played by the product in relation to the essential requirements and hence the choice between various control procedures. The defendant claims that it would be impossible in practice to subject each of a product's properties to a complicated control procedure, especially since paragraph 2 of Article 13(4) of Directive 89/106 requires the principle of proportionality to be applied, by stating that in each case the least onerous procedure consistent with safety is to be chosen.

46 In the reply, the applicant argues that the principle of proportionality only applies to the choice of procedure, but not to the content, that is to say, the characteristics to be checked and the implementation of the procedures as such.

47 The Commission reiterated in the rejoinder that it had taken into account all the essential requirements as well as the importance of the part played by the product with respect to meeting those requirements. The proof of this was that, as the products were thermal insulating materials, the least dangerous materials were subject to the least onerous conformity attestation procedure while the materials that could pose a fire hazard were subject to the procedure involving additional checks by a certification body. As for the principle of proportionality, the Commission argues that it applies throughout Community law, and consequently also applies as regards the organisation of the control procedure.

48 Under Article 13(4) of Directive 89/106, it is for the Commission to choose the procedure for attesting the conformity of a product, in other words to decide whether the manufacturer alone will ensure that products conform to the relevant technical specifications or whether an approved certification body should also be involved. This it does after consulting the Committee and on the basis of the following criteria: the importance of the part played by the product with respect to the essential requirements, in particular those relating to health and safety; the nature of the product; the effect of the variability of the product's characteristics on its serviceability; the susceptibility to defects in the product manufacture. On all these points, the Commission must take account of the provisions set out in Annex III.

49 In the contested decision, the Commission drew up two lists of products and product families in fact (Annexes 1 and 2), indicating which of the aforementioned procedures was to be used for the attestation of conformity. In Annex 3 it then requests CEN/Cenelec to specify, for the product and intended use in each case, the system of attestation of conformity in the relevant harmonised standards.

50 To better illustrate the way in which the contested decision is structured, I will take the example of thermal insulating materials. Those that belong to class A, B or C, (23) for which the reaction to fire performance (24) is not susceptible to change during the production process, (25) as well as those that belong to class D, E or F, appear in the list in Annex 1, meaning that, for the attestation of conformity, the manufacturer alone is responsible for the factory production control system ensuring that the product conforms to the technical specifications. In contrast, products in class A, B or C, for which the reaction to fire performance is susceptible to change during the production process, appear in Annex 2; consequently, the attestation of conformity of these products will, in addition to a factory production control system operated by the manufacturer, involve an approved certification body to assist in assessment and surveillance of production control or of the product itself.

51 In point 1 of Annex 3 of the contested decision, CEN and/or Cenelec are requested to specify the system of attestation of conformity in the relevant harmonised standards for all factory-made and in situ formed thermal insulating products, whatever their intended use. The thermal insulating materials mentioned in Annex 2, those for which the reaction to fire performance may change during the production process, remain subject to conformity attestation system No 1, which is the most complex and which corresponds to the system laid down in Annex III, point 2(i), of Directive 89/106, without the further testing of samples taken at the factory. In practice, this means that the attestation of conformity of the product in this case is specified by an approved body on the following basis:

(a) Tasks for the manufacturer:

(1) factory production control;

(2) and further testing of samples taken at the factory by the manufacturer in accordance with a prescribed test plan.

(b) Tasks for the approved body:

(3) initial type-testing of the product;

(4) initial inspection of factory and of factory production control;

(5) continuous surveillance, assessment and approval of factory production control.

52 For the purposes of specifying the conformity attestation system, the thermal insulating products appearing in Annex 1 are in turn divided into two classes according to their reaction to fire.

Thus, those that belong to class A, B or C are subject to conformity attestation system No 3, which is the one laid down in Annex III, point 2(ii), second possibility, in other words the declaration of conformity of the product by the manufacturer is made on the basis of:

(1) initial type-testing of the product by an approved laboratory,

(2) and factory production control, whilst the products in classes D, E and F are subject to conformity attestation system No 4, which is the least complex and corresponds to the one in Annex III, point 2(ii), third possibility. In this system, the declaration of conformity of the product by the manufacturer is made on the basis of:

(1) initial type-testing by the manufacturer;

(2) and factory production control.

53 In point 2.1, the Commission lays down the conditions to be applied by CEN in specifying the system of attestation of conformity: the specification for the system should be such that it can be implemented even where performance does not need to be determined for a certain characteristic because at least one Member State has no legal requirement at all for such characteristics. In those cases, the checking of such a characteristic must not be imposed on the manufacturer if he does not wish to declare the performance of the product in that respect.

54 In point 2.2, it is stated that for products coming under system 1 and system 3 the task of the approved body as regards the initial type-testing of the product is limited to the following characteristics:

Euroclasses characteristics for reaction to fire, as set out in Decision 94/611. (26)

55 In its application, the German Government provides a list for thermal insulating materials setting out, on the basis of data appearing in the document Construct 94/125, the other essential requirements that appear in Annex I of Directive 89/106 and the characteristics of the product which it considers are necessary but which have not been taken into account by the Commission for the initial type-testing, namely:

(a) regarding the essential requirement `energy economy and heat retention': temperature resistance; water vapour permeability; compressive strength; resistance to bending and corrodent emission level;

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

(b) regarding the essential requirement `protection against noise': sound absorption index and soundproofing index;

(c) regarding the essential requirement `hygiene, health and the environment': water permeability and dangerous substances emission level.

56 I partly agree with the Commission when it argues that a clear distinction should be made between, on the one hand, the choice of the procedure for attestation of conformity of a product, for which account should be taken of the criteria laid down in Article 13(4) of the Directive - and this in my view is what it did, by classifying the products and product families in Annexes 1 and 2 of the contested decision - and, on the other hand, something as different as the request to European standards bodies to specify the systems of attestation of conformity in the relevant harmonised standards for certain products and uses, as the Commission did in Annex 3 of the contested decision.

57 To return to my example of thermal insulating products, I see that whether the attestation of conformity is to be issued by the manufacturer alone or with the involvement of an approved certification body depends in the case of products in classes A, B and C (27) on whether the reaction to fire may change during the production process; in the first case, the products appear in Annex 2; in the second case, they are included in Annex 1; in contrast, classes D, E and F (28) only appear in Annex 1, in other words the attestation of conformity is the sole responsibility of the manufacturer.

Moreover, although class A, B and C products, whose reaction to fire is not liable to vary during production, and class D, E and F products all appear in Annex 1, the request by the Commission to the European standards bodies to specify the systems of attestation of conformity requires that the first group be subject to system 3, involving more stringent testing of products than for products in the second group, to which system 4 is applied.

58 These findings lead me to infer that, both for the family of products that I have given as an example and for the other product families subject to the provisions of the contested decision, the Commission has specified the procedure for attestation of conformity, in the provisions of Articles 1 and 2, combined with Annexes 1 and 2, taking account of the importance of the part played by the product with respect to the essential requirements, in particular those relating to health and safety, the nature of the product, the effect of the variability of the product's characteristics on its serviceability and the susceptibility to defects in the product manufacture.

59 However, as regards Annex 3, I have to agree with the German Government when it claims that there are other characteristics of the products that have not been taken into account for the initial type-testing, and that it is not possible to discover from the text of the decision, nor to deduce from the context in which it was adopted, why the Commission decided to limit the checking by the approved body to certain characteristics, to the exclusion of other properties of the product.

60 In view of the fact that the initial type-testing of the product constitutes a method of control of conformity under Annex III of Directive 89/106 for all the conformity attestation systems, I consider that once the Commission had determined the procedure for attestation of conformity for these product families - at which time I consider it took into account the criteria laid down in Article 13(4) - it could not, without infringing that article, abandon some of those criteria when it came to lay down the requirements to be met by the CEN when specifying the systems of conformity attestation, by stipulating that, during the initial type-testing, the approved body had to restrict itself to checking only some of the product characteristics.

61 This being so, and without there being any need in my view to consider the relevance of the principle of proportionality, I consider that the plea of breach of Article 13(4) is, in respect of Annex 3 of the contested decision, also well founded.

Conclusion

On those grounds, I propose that the Court of Justice:

(1) annul Commission Decision 95/204/EC of 31 May 1995 implementing Article 20(2) of Council Directive 89/106/EEC on construction products;

(2) order the Commission to pay the costs, pursuant to Article 69(2), first paragraph, of the Rules of Procedure, since the applicant has succeeded in its submissions.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 20 June 1996.
Commission of the European Communities v Hellenic Republic.
Failure by a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Failure to implement Directive 89/665/EEC within the prescribed period - Review procedures relating to public supply and public works contracts.
Case C-236/95.

1. By this action the Commission seeks a declaration that, by failing to adopt or failing to notify to it within the prescribed period the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply fully with Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (hereinafter `the directive'), (1) the Hellenic Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under the EEC Treaty and that directive. It also claims that the Hellenic Republic should be ordered to pay the costs.

2. Under Article 5 of the directive, the Member States had to bring into force, before 21 December 1991, the measures necessary to comply with the directive. The Member States also had to communicate to the Commission `the texts of the main national laws, regulations and administrative provisions which they adopt in the field governed by this Directive'.

3. Since it had received no communication to this effect from the Greek Government, the Commission put it on notice by letter dated 20 May 1992, pursuant to the procedure laid down by Article 169 of the Treaty, to submit its observations within two months.

4. In its reply dated 17 June 1993, the Greek Government informed the Commission that measures partially implementing the directive in its domestic legal system had been adopted as regards public works contracts - by Presidential Decree No 23 of 15 January 1993 -, but that in contrast no measure had been adopted in the sphere of public supply contracts.

5. Since it received no further information concerning the implementation of the directive in the latter field, on 4 July 1994 the Commission sent the Hellenic Republic a reasoned opinion asking it to take the necessary measures within two months.

6. On 18 August 1994 the Greek Government informed the Commission that a presidential decree was in preparation with a view to implementing the directive in the field of public supply contracts.

7. However, since the Hellenic Republic did not comply with its obligations under the directive in that field, the Commission brought this action for failure to fulfil obligations, which was received at the Court Registry on 6 July 1995.

8. As the Commission stated at the hearing, the infringement in question relates only to review procedures relating to the award of public supply contracts. The wording of the application proper differs slightly from that of the reasoned opinion (in the reasoned opinion, the infringement is stated to be `as regards supplies', whereas in the application the Hellenic Republic is charged with failing to comply `fully' with the directive, `... in particular... in the field of public supply contracts...', but, to my mind, that aspect cannot be construed as a change in the subject-matter of the action. Moreover, the parties have not raised this point.

9. The defendant does not deny that it did not take the necessary measures formally to implement the directive in the field of public supply contracts within the prescribed period. It nevertheless claims that the action should be dismissed.

10. It considers in the first place that the Greek legislation in force on public works and supply contracts, considered in conjunction with the provisions of the Code of Civil and Administrative Procedure and the Statute of the Council of State, (2) already affords sufficient judicial protection having regard to the requirements of the directive, bearing in mind that that protection has been further reinforced by recent case-law of the Council of State.

11. It further states that it has adopted supplementary measures in order fully to comply with the directive. An ad hoc statutory drafting committee was convened by Ministerial Decision P1/481 of 15 March 1993 with a view to proposing any supplementary measures. It adds that a draft presidential decree, drafted in August 1993 and notified to the Commission on 22 July 1994, is at the stage of obtaining the final signatures.

12. The Hellenic Republic justifies the delays in adopting those provisions on formal and procedural grounds, such as the fact that they had to be jointly considered by the competent authorities (Ministry of Industry and Ministry of Public Works), but above all on the grounds of recent changes in the case-law of the judicial division of the Council of State. It also points out that the supreme court has recently delivered a number of judgments on invitations to tender for public procurement and public works contracts (3) expressly referring to the directive. In view of those recent developments, the Hellenic Republic states that it is reconsidering the judicial protection available overall and whether or not it is necessary to press forward with the adoption of the relevant presidential decree. It further points out that the draft presidential decree has been amended in the light of observations received from the Commission.

13. That argument is not convincing.

14. In the first place, it is impossible effectively to argue that Article 52 of Presidential Decree No 18/89, a general text on the procedure for the stay of execution of an administrative measure contested by an action for annulment, can already secure the complete, correct transposition of the directive. (4)

15. Without making a detailed comparative study of the content of that provision and that of the directive, it is sufficient to observe - as the Commission pointed out at the hearing - that all the measures provided for by the directive do not appear in the relevant national legislation. For example, Article 52 relates only to procedures for a stay of execution, whereas the directive refers more broadly in Article 2(a) to any `interim measures', `including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract'. Furthermore, reliance can be made on Article 52 in Greek law only if there is a main action (action for annulment of an administrative measure). In contrast, the interim measures envisaged by the directive are to be capable of being sought independently of any prior action. It may also be mentioned that, according to Article 1(3), the directive calls upon the Member States to make the review procedures available `... at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement', whereas under the Greek provision the procedure is available only to an applicant for the annulment of a measure.

16. I would further observe that, in so far as it itself states that the measures required for the full implementation of the directive in its national law are in preparation and that the draft presidential decree in question has been amended to take account of observations from the Commission, the Greek Government has admitted, impliedly but necessarily, that the national legislation in force does not fully satisfy the requirements of the directive and that the directive was not implemented within the prescribed period.

17. The justifications put forward for the delays in adopting these measures, in particular the draft presidential decree mentioned, cannot be accepted either.

18. In the first place, the formal and procedural difficulties experienced in the course of the procedure, such as the joint examination by the competent ministries, are completely irrelevant:

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

the Court has consistently held that an argument based on internal legal constraints is inadmissible. The Court takes the view that `... a Member State may not plead provisions, practices or circumstances existing in its internal legal system in order to justify a failure to comply with the obligations and time-limits laid down in Community directives'. (5)

19. Next, as far as concerns the case-law of the Council of State referred to by the defendant, which, it maintains, by interpreting the national provisions in force in conformity with the directive, secures, if not formal, at least substantive implementation of the directive, it must be observed first that most of the judgments cited were given in 1995 and, as such, cannot be effectively relied upon by the Hellenic Republic, since `... whether there has been a failure to fulfil obligations must be examined on the basis of the position in which the Member State found itself at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion and the Court cannot take account of any subsequent changes'. (6) Consequently, to my mind, there is no need to dwell on the content of those judgments, irrespective of their importance in the arguments of the parties in the course of the proceedings.

20. Only judgment No 39/1991, which was given before the end of the pre-litigation procedure, might possibly be relevant. In that judgment, the Commission of the Council of State responsible for granting stays of execution provisionally suspended the execution of decisions relating to a procedure for the award of public works contracts in accordance with the aforementioned Article 52 on the application of a nature-protection association.

21. However, in my view no effects should attach to the reliance placed on that decision. In the first place, it relates to the field of public works contracts, whereas this action is confined to public supply contracts.

22. Above all, however, without even checking whether the Council of State's interpretation of the national legislation is consistent with the requirements of the directive, it is sufficient to recall that the Court has held that `... the fact that a practice is in conformity with the requirements of a directive may not constitute a reason for not transposing that directive into national law by provisions capable of creating a situation which is sufficiently precise, clear and transparent to enable individuals to ascertain their rights and obligations. As the Court held..., in order to secure the full implementation of directives in law and not only in fact, Member States must establish a specific legal framework in the area in question.' (7)

23. I would further observe - even if the Hellenic Republic does not support this argument (8) - that to allow that the case-law in question is capable of justifying delays in the adoption of implementation measures would be liable to mean that case-law could be capable of securing due implementation of the directive.

24. This would run counter to the fundamental requirements underlying any transposition: those of legal certainty and adequate publicity. (9) The Court has stated on many occasions that the provisions of a directive must be implemented `with unquestionable binding force... with the specificity, precision and clarity required ... in order to satisfy the requirement of legal certainty' (10) and so that `... where the directive is intended to create rights for individuals, the persons concerned can ascertain the full extent of their rights and, where appropriate, rely on them before the national courts'. (11)

25. It is, moreover, in view of those requirements of legal certainty and adequate publicity that, in mentioning the `measures necessary to comply with this Directive' which the Member States are to take, Article 5 expressly refers to `the texts of the main national laws, regulations and administrative provisions'. (12)

26. National case-law interpreting provisions of domestic law in a manner regarded as being in conformity with the requirements of a directive is not sufficient to make those provisions into measures transposing the directive in question.

27. Since the directive was not transposed within the prescribed period, the Commission's action must be held to be well founded.

28. Consequently, I propose that the Court declare that, by failing to adopt within the prescribed period the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply fully with Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, the Hellenic Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 5 of that directive. I further propose that the Hellenic Republic should be ordered to pay the costs in accordance with Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure.

(1) - OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33.

(2) - Specifically, Article 52 of Presidential Decree No 18/89 entitled `Codification of legislative provisions relating to the Council of State', which is concerned more particularly with the `procedure for the stay of execution of an administrative measure contested in an action for annulment'.

(3) - Judgments Nos 39/1991, 355/1995, 470/1995, 471/1995, 473/1995 and 559/1995.

(4) - In any event, even if it were to be held that that provision was capable of constituting a measure duly transposing the directive, there would none the less be an infringement for failure to notify the Commission in the prescribed period, since the provision in question was not relied upon by the Hellenic Republic until after the end of the pre-litigation procedure, for the first time in the rejoinder.

(5) - See, for example, Case C-253/95 Commission v Germany [1996] ECR I-0000, paragraph 12.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Lenz delivered on 16 February 1995.
Commission of the European Communities v Hellenic Republic.
Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations - Directive 77/62/EEC - Framework agreement for the exclusive supply of dressing material for use in Greek hospitals and by the Greek army.
Case C-79/94.

A - Introduction

1 On 11 July 1991 the Greek Ministry for Industry, Energy and Technology concluded an agreement with six Greek manufacturers of dressing materials. This `framework agreement' provided that the hospitals listed in Annex A of the agreement should purchase certain types of dressing material exclusively from those manufacturers. At the same time the six manufacturers undertook to produce these goods and supply them to those hospitals (Article 1 of the framework agreement). If in the future more hospitals were to be opened or other institutions made subject to the framework agreement, it was provided that such hospitals and institutions should also cover their requirements for the goods concerned exclusively from the said manufacturers (Article 8 of the framework agreement).

2 The framework agreement was to take effect for three years after it came into force. Entry into force was conditional on ratification by the Greek Minister for Industry, Energy and Technology, which was given by ministerial decree of 19 July 1991. The agreement also provided that its period of validity could be extended by one or two years (Article 14).

3 In a letter of 9 September 1991 the Commission asked the Greek Government to state its opinion on whether this procedure was compatible with Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts. (1)

4 As no reply was received to this letter, the Commission initiated the procedure laid down by Article 169 of the EC Treaty by giving the Greek Government, in a letter of 14 November 1991, an opportunity to submit its observations. In this letter the Commission stated its opinion that Directive 77/62 was applicable to the framework agreement concluded by the Greek Government and that the agreement ought therefore to have been the subject of a notice in the Official Journal of the European Communities pursuant to Article 9 of the directive. It is not disputed that no such notice was ever published.

5 The Greek Government contested these allegations. Accordingly, on 21 September 1992, the Commission delivered a reasoned opinion substantiating its allegations and examining the Greek Government's objections.

6 The Greek Government, in a letter of 10 December 1992, subsequently accepted that the Commission's view regarding the applicability of Directive 77/62 was correct. However, it claimed that the disputed agreement had not adversely affected competition in the Community and that there would be considerable difficulty in cancelling the framework agreement unilaterally, particularly as this would expose the Greek State to claims for damages by the manufacturers concerned. Furthermore, the Greek authorities had already complied with the Commission's recommendations. Thus, a provision in the framework agreement stipulating that only Greek primary products should be used in the manufacture of the dressing materials in question had been deleted. Consideration was also being given to refraining from exercising the option of extending the framework agreement beyond the proposed term of three years.

7 After the Commission had indicated that, in its opinion, the Treaty infringement of which it complained had not been remedied by these measures, the Greek Government sent a further letter on 13 February 1993 which described once again the measures which the Greek Government had taken or proposed to take and which had already been set out in the letter of 10 December 1992. The letter added that the Greek Government had informed the parties to the framework agreement that it was considering terminating that agreement unilaterally before the expiry date. The Greek Government also stated its intention to organize, before the end of 1993, an invitation to tender for the supply of dressing materials which would comply with all the requirements of Community law.

8 As the stated intentions of the Greek Government were not followed by concrete action, the Commission finally brought the matter before the Court of Justice pursuant to Article 169 of the EC Treaty. The Commission asks the Court:

(1) to declare that, by concluding a framework agreement for the exclusive supply by six Greek textile manufacturers of dressing materials for use by hospitals and the Greek army and by not publishing a notice to that effect in the Official Journal of the European Communities, the Hellenic Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directive 77/62/EEC;

(2) to order the Hellenic Republic to pay the costs of the action.

9 The Hellenic Republic considers the action brought by the Commission to be inadmissible, but also raises objections on its merits. The defendant accordingly requests the Court to dismiss the action and order the Commission to pay the costs.

B - Analysis

Admissibility

10 The defendant considers the action inadmissible in two respects. First, it points out that it acknowledged, in its reply to the Commission's reasoned opinion, its failure to fulfil its obligations under the EC Treaty. At the same time, it explained in its reply that the framework agreement would not be extended beyond the planned term of three years and that the provisions of Community law would in future be complied with. In the defendant's opinion, the action brought by the Commission is abusive and in breach of the obligation to treat Member States equally. The Hellenic Republic refers in this connection to the procedure followed by the Commission in an action brought against Italy for failure to fulfil Treaty obligations. (2) In that case, it claims, the Commission treated as sufficient a written declaration that the provisions of Community law would be observed in the future.

Second, the defendant considers the action inadmissible because the Commission intervened only at the stage when the contested agreement was to be implemented. Under Article 3(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, (3) the Commission must take steps before the contract in question is concluded if it considers that the Community provisions concerning the award of public contracts have been infringed.

11 The second submission of the Greek Government must be dismissed immediately. If, in pursuing an infringement of the Community provisions in the field of public procurement, the Commission does not act as diligently as might have been expected in view of the circumstances of the case, this may be relevant to a decision on an application by the Commission for interim measures in the context of an action for failure to comply with Treaty obligations. (4) However, it in no way affects the admissibility of the action as such. In any event, the Commission has rightly pointed out that it informed the Greek Government of its objections as early as 9 September 1991, that is to say, less than two months after the framework agreement had entered into effect.

12 The purpose of Article 3(1) of Directive 89/665 was to enable the Commission to intervene with the Member States if, `prior to a contract being concluded', it considered that a clear and manifest infringement of Community provisions in the field of public procurement had been committed. The power in question is thus aimed at prevention. As the Commission rightly points out, this cannot affect the Commission's powers under Article 169 of the EC Treaty. This is confirmed by the Court's judgment of 24 January 1995 in an action for failure to fulfil Treaty obligations brought by the Commission against the Netherlands. (5) In that judgment the Court pointed out that `that special procedure under Directive 89/665 is a preliminary measure which can neither derogate from nor replace the powers of the Commission under Article 169 of the Treaty'. (6)

13 That question is in any case irrelevant here. If the Commission is to take steps `prior to a contract being concluded', this presupposes that it is aware of the contract before its conclusion. However, the defendant has not alleged (let alone proved) that the Commission was already aware of the framework agreement before 19 July 1991.

14 The defendant's first argument in support of the inadmissibility of the action likewise lacks conviction. The Hellenic Republic pleads that it has acknowledged and discontinued the failure in respect of Treaty obligations alleged by the Commission. This submission is particularly surprising in view of the fact that the defendant here also challenges the merits of the action brought by the Commission, that is to say, it specifically denies any failure to fulfil its obligations. However, the Greek Government's argument is untenable even if this inconsistency is overlooked. The argument is based primarily on the fact that the defendant gave the Commission a written undertaking to observe the relevant provisions of Community law in the future (that is to say, after the expiry of the framework agreement). In other words, the Greek Government takes the view that it rectified its alleged infringement of the Treaty by promising to comply with its Treaty obligations in the future.

15 There can be no serious doubt that this argument must be rejected. Member States would otherwise have a simple and convenient defence against actions under Article 169 of the Treaty for failure to fulfil their obligations. The present case offers a particularly good example of this. As already mentioned, the contested framework agreement was concluded in July 1991 for a period of three years. In its letter of 10 December 1992, thus at a time when not even half of the period had elapsed, the Greek Government informed the Commission that it was considering not extending the period of validity of the framework agreement. In its letter of 13 February 1993 it indicated that it might terminate the agreement before its expiry date. However, this was not done, as the statement of defence confirms. The Greek Government has not referred to any circumstances which would suggest that it was impossible for it to terminate the agreement prematurely. The general and unquantified reference to claims for damages which might possibly be brought by the manufacturers concerned against the Greek State in the event of termination is not sufficient for this purpose. The mere promise to adhere to Community law in the future could not remedy the infringement of the Treaty.

16 Contrary to the Greek Government's opinion, the action brought by the Commission against Italy for failure to fulfil Treaty obligations, which was the subject of the Court's judgment in Case 199/85, (7) does not support an argument to the contrary. That case concerned the construction of a solid-waste recycling plant by the Municipality of Milan, in relation to which the provisions of Directive 71/305/EEC concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts were disregarded. The Commission's reasoned opinion in that case complained of this infringement and requested Italy to take `the necessary measures'. The reasoned opinion added that the necessary measures were to be understood as including in particular a written undertaking by the Municipality of Milan to observe all the provisions of Directive 71/305 in the future.

17 However, the Hellenic Republic's reliance on the procedure followed by the Commission in the above case is mistaken in at least two respects. First, it must be observed that the Commission brought an action for infringement of the Treaty before the Court in that case even though the Mayor of Milan had made a written declaration in the abovementioned terms, and the Court upheld the Commission's application. It should be noted that, in connection with the question of admissibility, the Court pointed out in its judgment that the Italian authorities had adopted no `practical measure' to give effect to that declaration. (8) Second, it is significant that the original situation in that case was quite different from the present situation. The Commission delivered its reasoned opinion in the earlier case on the assumption that the construction work in question was as good as finished and therefore the contracts which had been awarded could no longer be suspended or cancelled. (9) In that context it is clear why the Commission was inclined to accept an undertaking with regard to the future. In the present case, by contrast, the Greek Government was perfectly able to remedy the infringement of the Treaty - at least, with regard to the remaining term of the framework agreement - on receipt of the Commission's reasoned opinion because the effects of the framework agreement were far from exhausted at that date.

18 In its statement of defence the Greek Government also seeks to rely on the fact that one of the provisions of the framework agreement was cancelled in response to the Commission's remonstrations. As already mentioned, this was a clause to the effect that only Greek primary products should be used in the production of the dressing materials in question. While the cancellation of this condition was undoubtedly a step in the right direction, this amendment was of course not sufficient to remedy the Treaty infringement alleged by the Commission as it did not affect the substance of the framework agreement, that is to say, the obligation on the hospitals and other institutions to obtain their supplies solely from the six Greek manufacturers named in the agreement.

19 For the sake simply of completeness, it may be mentioned that the fact that the Commission's reasoned opinion (and the application in this action itself) complains of the exclusive purchasing obligation for `hospitals and the army', whereas the letter of 14 November 1991 requesting the Greek Government's observations referred only to `hospitals', has no bearing on the question of admissibility. As the representative of the Greek Government explained during the hearing, the exclusive purchasing obligation applied from the beginning also to army hospitals. The wording chosen by the Commission in its letter therefore corresponds to the terms of the application. This, in my opinion, is sufficient. (10) The Greek Government has in any event raised no objection on this point.

Substance

20 In the course of time Directive 77/62 has undergone many amendments (11) and was finally recast by Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts. (12) According to the Court's case-law, the question whether there has been a failure to fulfil obligations must be examined on the basis of the position in which the Member State found itself at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. (13) In the present case, therefore, regard must be had to the factual and legal situation towards the end of 1992. The version of the provisions applicable at that time, which must therefore be examined here, appears in Council Directive 88/295/EEC of 22 March 1988. (14) In its application the Commission refers to the provisions of the original version of the directive. As the subsequent amendments do not entail any material alterations so far as the present case is concerned, the position is not affected. I shall refer below to the provisions applying at the end of 1992.

21 According to Article 9(2) of Directive 77/62, contracting authorities who wish to award a public supply contract must make known their intention by means of a notice. However, pursuant to Article 5(1)(a), first indent - overlooking the supply contracts referred to in Article 5(1)(a), second indent, which are not at issue in the present case - this obligation applies only to public supply contracts concluded by contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the directive and the estimated value of which is not less than ECU 200 000. Under Article 1(a) of the directive, `public supply contracts' are `contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing' between a supplier and one of the contracting authorities defined in Article 1(b) for `the purchase, lease, rental or hire purchase, with or without option to buy, of products'.

22 The Commission contends that the Greek Ministry for Industry, Energy and Technology and the hospitals and other institutions covered by the disputed agreement must be regarded as `contracting authorities' within the meaning of the directive. This seems to me correct and the Greek Government does not disagree. However, the latter has raised the objection that the framework agreement does not come within the scope of the directive because it is only a `structure' within which a large number of supply contracts are concluded, none of which exceeds ECU 200 000 in value.

23 The Greek Government thus takes the view that the supply contracts concluded by the hospitals and other institutions concerned should be considered on an individual basis. As none of them has a value of more than ECU 200 000, it argues, the directive does not apply at all. This submission may imply a further argument, concerning the question whether the disputed framework agreement is a `supply contract' at all within the meaning of the directive. It is not entirely clear from the submissions of the Greek Government's representative at the hearing whether the Greek Government opposes the Commission's application on this point also. I shall therefore deal briefly with it just in case this is so.

24 The first argument strikes me as unsound. By concluding the framework agreement the Greek Government (or the responsible Ministry) itself amalgamated the separate supply contracts into a single unit. That being so, the only consistent course to follow is to consider the whole, rather than individual supply contracts, as a basis for calculating the value. This is supported by the Commission's observation that otherwise it would be possible to circumvent the provisions of Directive 77/62. It is common ground that the value calculated on the basis of all the supply contracts covered by the framework agreement exceeds the threshold of ECU 200 000.

25 It may of course be more important to determine whether the framework agreement is a `supply contract' at all within the meaning of the directive. In order to fill out the framework created by the framework agreement it is of course necessary for the hospitals and other institutions concerned to place specific supply contracts. Furthermore, `pecuniary interest' is payable only on the basis of individual contracts. However, these considerations are rather theoretical. All the principal contractual elements, in particular the exclusive purchasing obligation and the price calculation, are already laid down in the framework agreement, with the result that the individual supply contracts do little more than specify the quantity to be supplied. In those circumstances there should hardly be any doubt that, having regard to the interpretation required here, which must be guided by the aims of the directive, a framework agreement of this kind must be treated as a supply contract within the meaning of the directive. (15) If this were not accepted, the present action would have to be dismissed (because there would be no breach of Directive 77/62). However, the framework agreement would then quite certainly have to be classified as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction on imports within the meaning of Article 30 of the EC Treaty in so far as it prevents tenderers from other Member States from supplying specific customers in Greece.

26 The Greek Government also claims that in the present case it refrained from publishing the notice required by Article 9 of the directive because no tenderers from other Member States have so far shown any interest in such supply contracts. A notice would for that reason have been a meaningless formality. This contention must be categorically rejected. Clearly, it is perfectly possible that the situation described by the Greek Government is attributable precisely to the fact that no information was available to potential tenderers from other Member States.

27 Finally, the Greek Government contends that such notice was unnecessary by reason of one of the derogations provided for by Article 6 (16) of the Directive. This provision relates to cases where `for technical or artistic reasons, or for reasons connected with protection of exclusive rights, the goods supplied may be manufactured or delivered only by a particular supplier'. At the hearing before the Court the representative of the Greek Government was unable to explain how this provision could apply to the present case, which concerns the supply of dressing materials. As the Court has recently reconfirmed (and precisely with reference to this provision of Directive 77/62), the burden of proof in this connection is borne by the party which seeks to rely on the derogation. (17) The claim made by the Greek Government during the hearing that the dressing materials in question could have been supplied in any case only by the six Greek manufacturers is of no significance - quite apart from the fact that the representative of the Greek Government was unable, in response to a question from the Court, to produce proof of this - because the directive does not provide for an exception in this respect.

C - Conclusion

I propose accordingly that the Court uphold the Commission's application and order the Hellenic Republic to pay the costs of the action.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Léger delivered on 14 February 1995.
European Parliament v Council of the European Union.
Technical assistance to the independent States of the former Soviet Union and to Mongolia - Consultation of the Parliament.
Case C-417/93.

1. By application lodged on 12 October 1993, the European Parliament (hereinafter "the Parliament") seeks the annulment of Council Regulation (Euratom, EEC) No 2053/93 of 19 July 1993 concerning the provision of technical assistance to economic reform and recovery in the independent States of the former Soviet Union and Mongolia. (1)

2. The case seeks a ruling from the Court on two key questions in the relationship between the Parliament and the Council. Is the requirement for genuine consultation of Parliament satisfied where the Council deliberates on a proposal for a Commission regulation before the Parliament delivers its opinion, and adopts that regulation four days after the latter' s opinion? Can the Council study the proposal and suggest amendments before the matter has even been referred to the Parliament for its opinion?

3. Regulation No 2053/93 was adopted in the following circumstances.

4. The TACIS assistance programme was established for 1991 and 1992 by Council Regulation (EEC, Euratom) No 2157/91 of 15 July 1991. (2)

5. On 25 November 1992, the Commission adopted a proposal for a regulation [COM (92) 475 final] (3) enabling the technical assistance programme to the new independent States to be continued on the basis of indicative programmes for a three-year period. (4) The legal basis of that proposal, like that of Regulation No 2157/91, was Article 235 of the EEC Treaty and Article 203 of the EAEC Treaty.

6. That proposal was sent by the Commission to the Council on 15 January 1993 and communicated to the Parliament for information on the same day.

7. Following study by a Council working party called "former USSR", a document was submitted to COREPER on 4 March 1993. (5) The Council considered the proposal for a regulation on 5 April 1993 and noted "a wide convergence of views". (6) It was agreed to reconsider the proposal when the Parliament had delivered its opinion.

8. On 5 March 1993, the Council sent the Commission' s proposal to the Parliament for its opinion. It requested that the opinion be delivered at the April sitting. (7)

9. On 12 March 1993, the President of the Parliament referred the proposal to the relevant committees for consideration.

10. On 23 March 1993, the Council confirmed the step it had taken and sought to implement the urgent procedure provided for in Article 75 of the Rules of Procedure of the Parliament. (8) That request was rejected on 20 April 1993. (9)

11. A draft report (10) was considered on 26 April 1993 by the "External Economic Relations" committee (hereinafter "the REX committee") which unanimously adopted a draft legislative resolution on 5 May 1993.

12. On 27 May 1993, the Parliament adopted almost all the amendments proposed by the REX committee. (11) The rapporteur however had the vote on the draft legislative resolution postponed pursuant to Article 40(2) (12) of the Parliament' s Rules of Procedure, (13) "In view of the Council' s position...". (14)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

13. On 16 June 1993, the Council again requested that the urgent procedure be used, if necessary by convening an extraordinary session, so that the opinion could be delivered in June.

14. On 22 June 1993, the Parliament agreed to that request.

15. After a final referral back to committee on 24 June 1993, the legislative resolution concluding the consultation procedure was adopted on 14 July 1993: the Commission' s proposal was rejected. (15)

16. The Council finally adopted Regulation No 2053/93 on 19 July 1993.

17. The application for annulment is based on three pleas in law:

° the circumstances of the procedure for consulting the Parliament were unlawful. The consultation procedure was fictitious and took place in breach of Article 5 of the EEC Treaty;

° the Parliament should have been reconsulted;

° Regulation No 2053/93 is unlawful in that it provides that it may be amended at the Council' s discretion, without the involvement of the Parliament.

18. I will consider those three pleas in turn.

I ° The unlawfulness of the consultation procedure

19. It has been stated that "the Parliament is the only one of the institutional participants in the consultation procedure (political institutions (16) and Member States) not to be present at Council meetings". (17)

20. That indicates the importance for inter-institutional balance of respecting the Parliament' s prerogatives in the consultation procedure, even if that procedure is no longer, since the Single European Act, the only means by which the Parliament can make its voice heard in the legislative process.

21. The case-law of the Court of Justice has established three principles:

° consultation is an essential formality;

° consultation must be genuine;

° the legislative process is not discretionary.

22. The application for annulment which culminated in the judgment in Roquette Frères v Council (18) concerned a regulation adopted by the Council without following the consultation procedure.

23. The Court made the following succinct statement:

> "The consultation provided for in the third subparagraph of Article 43(2), as in other similar provisions of the Treaty, is the means which allows the Parliament to play an actual part in the legislative process of the Community. Such power represents an essential factor in the institutional balance intended by the Treaty. Although limited, it reflects at Community level the fundamental democratic principle that the peoples should take part in the exercise of power through the intermediary of a representative assembly. Due consultation of the Parliament in the cases provided for by the Treaty therefore constitutes an essential formality disregard of which means that the measure concerned in void". (19)

24. The Court has applied that principle not only where there had been no consultation but also where there had been insufficient consultation. (20)

25. Even though in practice the Commission normally sends a copy of its proposals for regulations

to the Parliament for information, (21) the latter may be formally requested to give an opinion by the Council alone. The requirement for consultation is not satisfied simply by submitting such a request. "... observance of that requirement implies that the Parliament has expressed its opinion." (22) The pure and simple rejection by the Parliament of the proposal is an opinion within the meaning of the Treaty. (23)

26. The consultation must be genuine. It must be such as "... to affect the substance of the measure adopted". (24) The Parliament must be able to influence the content of legislative measures adopted by the Council. It follows that the Council must await the Parliament' s opinion before adopting the measure.

27. Even though the adoption of an opinion by the Parliament is not subject to any time constraints, I consider that its powers are not unlimited: in my view it follows from paragraph 36 of the judgment in Roquette Frères v Council, cited above, that the Council may act notwithstanding the absence of the Parliament' s opinion if it establishes that it has "... exhausted all the possibilities of obtaining the preliminary opinion of the Parliament", if the latter is not to be given a right of veto. (25)

28. It can be seen that consultation, where it is required, gives rise to obligations both on the Council and on the Parliament. (26)

29. Finally, the legislative process is not discretionary. It is not left to the discretion of the Member States or the institutions: (27)

> "In accordance with the balance of powers between the institutions provided for by the Treaties, the practice of the European Parliament cannot deprive the other institutions of a prerogative granted to them by the Treaties themselves". (28)

30. The Court held in United Kingdom v Council (29) that:

> "... the rules regarding the manner in which the Community institutions arrive at their decisions are laid down in the Treaty and are not at the disposal of the Member States or of the institutions themselves". (30)

31. Those three principles illustrate the application of a general principle of cooperation in good faith between institutions, based on the fact that the latter are united in the attainment of the common objectives set by the Treaty (31) and interlinked in the decision-making process.

32. That principle is present in Article 5 of the EEC Treaty which applies to the Member States ° but which also imposes on the Community institutions reciprocal duties of cooperation in good faith with the Member States (32) ° and in Article 162 of the Treaty (33) which governs the relations between the Council and the Commission.

33. The Court has applied it to the relations between the Council, the Commission and the Parliament in the context of the budgetary procedure, based essentially, according to the judgment in Greece v Council, (34) on "inter-institutional dialogue". (35)

34. Even though the powers of the Parliament are not as extensive for the purposes of the consultation procedure as they are for the purposes of the budgetary procedure, that dialogue is equally indispensable. That is particularly so in the context of Article 235 of the EEC Treaty which provides for the Council to legislate in areas in which the Treaty has not conferred on it the power to act. The parameters within which the legislature may act are not as clearly laid down there as they are, for example, in relation to the common agricultural policy to which the consultation procedure also applies (Article 43(2) of the EEC Treaty).

35. Has there been such a dialogue in this case?

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

36. It has not been denied that the Parliament was consulted on the Commission' s proposal for the regulation. The only issue is the circumstances of that consultation. They give rise to three questions which I will consider in turn.

A ° May the Council deliberate on the proposal for the regulation before receiving the Parliament' s opinion but after sending the request for the opinion to the latter?

B ° May the Council deliberate on the proposal for the regulation before even sending the request for the opinion to the Parliament?

C ° Has the Council in this case cooperated in good faith with the Parliament?

° A °

37. May the Council deliberate on the Commission' s proposal before the Parliament has given its opinion? What are the Council' s powers while awaiting the Parliament' s opinion?

38. It is clear from Article 235 of the Treaty that the Council acts after consulting the Parliament on a proposal from the Commission. May it discuss the document before that consultation?

39. With the passage of time and the increase in the Community' s legislative activities, the practice of the legislative process requiring consultation of the Parliament has developed significantly.

40. As early as 16 October 1973, in a communication addressed to the Parliament, the Council undertook to facilitate the consultation procedure:

> "The Council has adopted internal measures designed to ensure that the decision to consult the European Parliament on a proposal from the Commission can be made within the shortest possible time (in principle one week after receipt of the Commission proposal)... In addition, the Council has adopted internal measures designed to ensure that the opinions of the European Parliament can be considered in the best conditions". (36)

41. From 1986, two trends were reflected in questions to the President by several Members of the European Parliament. (37) On the one hand, it seems that the various Commission proposals are discussed simultaneously in the Council and the Parliamentary committees. It seems that such a practice is not exceptional: "In practice, work on a Commission proposal begins immediately within Council bodies, without waiting for the Parliament' s Opinion, but the final decision cannot be taken until the Opinion has been received and considered by the Council". (38) The effect is that the Parliament' s discussions are based on Commission texts which have been superseded. On the other hand, it is said that the Council increasingly adopts provisional decisions, "pending the Parliament' s opinion". The figures quoted in the replies by the President of the Parliament to Mr de Vries' s questions (39) show that that practice has unquestionably become widespread. (40)

42. By a resolution of 10 October 1990, (41) the Parliament "1. Call[ed] on the Council to adhere to the procedures laid down in the Treaties and to refrain from conducting political agreements before having considered Parliament' s opinions".

43. On 21 November 1990, the Parliament adopted a resolution on the obligation for the Council to await Parliament' s opinion (42) in which it noted that "in numerous cases" the Council had begun work on a Commission proposal before the Parliament had delivered its opinion and that it had even concluded political agreements in advance.

44. Is this practice compatible with the Parliament' s rights under the consultation procedure?

45. It would be futile to wish to constrain the Council to await the Parliament' s opinion on a Commission proposal before starting any study, discussion or consideration of the proposal in question. (43) In my view, the practice is justified for legal reasons and for reasons of legislative policy.

46. I have the following points in relation to the latter:

° the inevitable delays in the procedure for consulting the Parliament;

° the latter' s limited acceptance of the urgent procedure in Article 97 of its Rules of Procedure (formerly Article 75);

° the necessity for prompt legislation in all the areas where regulations are laid down for a limited period or must be periodically renewed;

° the time needed, in areas where unanimity is required, to work towards a compromise within the Council;

° enrichment of the discussions within the Parliament' s committees before which the Council representative will, if relevant, have to be in a position to describe his institution' s position.

47. Such a practice is more fundamentally justified by legal reasons.

48. First, nothing requires the Council to abstain from acting until the Parliament' s opinion has been delivered. (44)

49. Secondly, and above all, the consultation procedure does not confer on the Parliament the right to give an opinion on the latest version of the text prepared by the Council. In essence, that text is flexible and changing until the adoption of the definitive regulation. Although it precludes the Council from finally adopting an act before receiving the Parliament' s opinion, that procedure at no time requires that the text on which the Parliament gives its opinion and the text as it is after the Council has worked on it should correspond exactly. The Parliament gives its opinion on the Commission' s proposal. It is precisely that which distinguishes the consultation procedure from the legislative co-decision procedure where "agreement on a joint text" (45) is sought or from the cooperation procedure where the Parliament is consulted not only on the Commission' s proposal but also on the "common position" adopted by the Council. (46) Finally, and in contrast to the assent procedure under which the Council may not adopt a measure different from that on which the opinion was given, the consultation procedure permits it to depart from the text submitted to the Parliament.

50. In order to ensure that the Parliament is genuinely consulted, guarantees have been established both by the Treaty and by the case-law of the Court of Justice and parliamentary practice.

51. Before adopting the opinion, the Commission in principle keeps the relevant committee of the Parliament regularly informed of the principal trends of the Council' s discussions, in particular where those discussions are moving away from its initial proposal, in accordance with the code of conduct which it presented to the Parliament in February 1990. (47)

52. If the Parliament approves the proposal for a regulation without amendment and if there are no substantial amendments in the final version of the regulation as a result of the preliminary discussions within the Council, the Court has held, in Tunnel Refineries v Council, (48) that that regulation may be adopted without reconsulting Parliament once the latter has delivered its opinion.

53. The Parliament must be reconsulted if the Council retains substantial amendments in the version of the document which is finally adopted, as the Court has consistently held in relation to reconsultation. (49) There is no reconsultation for minor amendments to the text.

54. If the Council makes amendments to the proposal in the course of the preliminary discussions, the Commission may use its prerogative to submit an amended proposal to the Council which forwards

it to the Parliament, thus enabling the latter to debate on the basis of an up-to-date document and to have some influence on the Council' s deliberations. As long as the proposal has not been decided upon by the Council, the Commission may amend it throughout the process leading up to the adoption of a Community act, pursuant to Article 189a(2) of the EC Treaty, (50) but neither the Council nor the Parliament may force it do so. That possibility was seen by Wyatt and Dashwood: "... the Commission may alter its proposal in order to facilitate decision-making within the Council". (51)

55. In that event, the Parliament therefore need not, strictly speaking, be "reconsulted" (not having yet issued its opinion) but is consulted on an amended proposal. That is exactly what the Parliament proposed in its resolution of 21 November 1990 (52) on the obligation to await the Parliament' s opinion in the cooperation procedure:

> "[The Parliament] Stresses... that practices introduced for the completion without delay of the internal market on 1 January 1993 frequently require almost simultaneous consideration of legislative proposals by the European Parliament and the Council and therefore requests the Commission to take advantage of the opportunity given to it by Article 149(3) of the Treaty and to formally submit a modified proposal before first reading by the European Parliament to take account of the work done by the Council if the latter leads to the Commission deciding to modify substantially the initial proposal, thereby permitting the European Parliament to deliver an opinion on a legislative proposal without being overtaken by events".

56. To that effect the Parliament, at its sitting on 15 September 1993, (53) adopted a new Rule 56 of its Rules of Procedure which provides:

> "Modification of a proposal by the Commission
> 1. If the committee responsible, during its examination of a Commission proposal, becomes aware that the Council intends to amend substantially this proposal, it shall formally ask the Commission whether it intends to modify its proposal.
> 2. If the Commission declares that it intends to modify its proposal, the committee responsible shall postpone its examination of this proposal until it has been informed about the new proposal or amendments by the Commission.
> 3. During the examination of a Commission proposal in the committee responsible, the Commission may also on its own initiative table amendments to its proposal directly in the committee.
> 4. If the Commission declares, following a request under paragraph 1, that it does not intend to modify its proposal, the committee responsible shall proceed with its examination of the proposal. The declaration of the Commission shall be annexed to the report and shall be considered by Parliament as binding on the Commission even after the completion of the first reading.
> 5. If, following a Commission declaration under paragraph 4, the Council, notwithstanding the position of the Commission, proceeds to a decision which substantially modifies the original Commission proposal, the President of Parliament shall remind the Council of its obligation to consult Parliament again."

57. Note that by the wording of that rule the Parliament implicitly accepts that the Council may, before receiving the Parliament' s opinion, debate a Commission proposal.

58. The procedure laid down by that article in my view serves to safeguard the Parliament' s prerogatives. Because the Commission presents an amended proposal, the Parliament will be consulted on a document which takes account of any changes arising from negotiations within the Council and it may exert a real influence on the latter' s deliberations.

59. The Parliament is not however dependent on the Commission. The fact that the latter, if it does not see fit to present an amended proposal, takes no action does not obviate the need for the Parliament to be reconsulted where there has been substantial amendment.

60. But to confer on the Parliament the right, in the name of genuine consultation, to be consulted on the latest draft after the Council has worked on it, whatever the importance of the latter' s amendments to the proposal, in my view undermines the consultation procedure and turns it into a type of cooperation procedure.

61. Let me repeat, it is on the Commission' s proposal that the opinion must be given, on the understanding that the Parliament will be informed of any substantial amendments to that proposal which the Council may initiate, whether by a new Commission proposal or by way of reconsultation.

62. On the other hand, the Council' s position cannot be definitive and is necessarily subject to amendment for so long as the opinion of the Parliament has not been delivered. (54)

63. I consider that the constitutional principle of cooperation in good faith between institutions is respected by the "inter-institutional dialogue" to which the Court referred in Greece v Commission, cited above.

64. To conclude, on that first point I consider that the Council and the Parliament can consider the proposal simultaneously, on the understanding that reconsultation is required if the preliminary discussions and political agreements within the Council have culminated in substantial amendments in the regulation finally adopted.

65. It may be seen that the reply to the first plea in law depends on whether there has been substantial amendment. That plea is thus linked to the second, concerning reconsultation by the question common to both: did the Council substantially amend the Commission' s initial proposal?

° B °

66. What is the position when the Council deliberates on the Commission' s proposal and amends it even before referring it to the Parliament? May it send the Parliament a request for consultation based on a text which does not reflect its own most recent deliberations?

67. The constitutional principle of cooperation in good faith between institutions requires that the text of the proposal submitted to the Parliament for its opinion and that considered by the Council be identical.

68. What is the position, in the light of that principle, when the Council and the Parliament have received an identical text but, when the Parliament receives the Commission' s initial proposal from the Council, that text has already been amended within the Council?

69. I have three comments on this.

70. First, such a question would not arise if the Council sent the request for an opinion to the Parliament as soon as it received the Commission' s proposal or before starting to consider it. (55)

71. Secondly, since as I have shown the opinion of the Parliament concerns the Commission proposal and not the latest version of the text being deliberated within the Council, the Community rules of legislative procedure do not mean that the Council cannot start discussing the proposal before the request for the opinion has even been sent, provided that it always keeps open the option of modifying its provisional stance in the light of the Parliament' s opinion. It cannot therefore at that stage adopt a definitive text.

72. In this case,

° before the request for the Parliament' s opinion was sent on 5 March 1993, the proposal had been considered neither by COREPER (which considered it for the first time on 24 March 1993) nor by the Council (which was to consider it first on 5 April 1993). As at 5 March 1993, there was a working draft drawn up by the "former USSR" group which was called a provisional report and the text of the regulation "reflecting the group' s work to date";

° the text prepared by the "former USSR" group on 4 March 1993, that is to say on the day before referral to the Parliament, was not a final version: the question of applying the TACIS regulation to Mongolia had not been settled. (56) The list in Annex II of the areas to be given priority in technical assistance had not been definitively decided and was subject to numerous qualifications. The proposed committee was a management committee and four Member States expressed a wish for a type III procedure. (57) The final regulation followed that formula.

73. It accordingly seems exaggerated to claim that on 5 March 1993 the proposal "... was no longer current..." (58) or "... that before referral to the Parliament, discussions within the Council had made that text obsolete". (59)

74. Thirdly, the amendments to the proposal considered within the Council before the request for an opinion was sent do not affect the lawfulness of the procedure since, like amendments made after sending the request, they will give rise to reconsultation if they are substantial and if they are included in the final regulation.

75. The limits to the Council' s power to deliberate on the proposal even before the Parliament examines it are to be found in the abuse of the law which would be committed if it were to leave the latter in total ignorance of the changes made to the text by the Council. It is that issue which I must now consider.

° C °

76. I consider that there was cooperation in good faith between institutions which gave the Parliament the means of knowing the Council' s position on the principal points of disagreement, given that:

° it seems that the Council never had any intention of dispensing with the opinion of the European Parliament; (60)

° the REX committee was aware that the Council intended to add an Annex II listing the sectors to be given priority in assistance and even incorporated it as part of amendment no 20 which it moved. It also knew that the Council was considering establishing a regulatory committee; (61)

° the Parliament was informed of the Council' s intended amendment on the question of comitology by the Commission' s representative at the debate. (62) It was moreover the Council' s position on that question (63) which led the Parliament to deliver a negative opinion; (64)

° the Council was represented at the discussion before the Parliament on 26 and 27 May 1993.

77. I will make one final point. It is not certain that the Parliament did everything in its power to influence the Council' s decision:

° the Council would of necessity have redebated the text if amendments had been submitted to it. The Commission would also have been able to accept any amendments by submitting an amended proposal. (65) The Council could not have departed from it except unanimously. (66) The Parliament preferred to deliver an opinion which simply rejected the Commission' s proposal outright;

° the Parliament would also, in delivering its opinion, have been able to initiate the conciliation procedure provided for by the joint declaration of 4 March 1975, (67) which was moreover recommended in the draft legislative resolution drawn up by the REX committee, at paragraph 4. The principal point of friction between the Council and the Parliament here is known to have concerned comitology. In a resolution of 23 October 1986, the European Parliament had specifically expressed the wish to be able to "... demand the opening of the conciliation procedure with the Council if the Council wishes to provide for a committee procedure in a legal act". (68)

78. I accordingly consider that the consultation of the Parliament was not fictitious and that its prerogatives were not infringed, provided that the amendments decided on by the Council were not substantial, in which case reconsultation was required. That is precisely the subject matter of the second plea in law.

II ° The obligation to reconsult

79. The obligation to reconsult the Parliament is not laid down by the Treaty. The Court however has held:

> "... the duty to consult the European Parliament in the course of the legislative procedure, in the cases provided for by the Treaty, includes a requirement that the Parliament be reconsulted on each occasion when the text finally adopted, viewed as a whole, departs substantially from the text on which the Parliament has already been consulted, except where the amendments essentially correspond to the wish of the Parliament itself". (69)

80. According to the Parliament, four substantial amendments were made to the Commission' s proposal:

° concerning the beneficiaries of TACIS assistance (Article 2);

° concerning the material scope of the regulation with the addition of an Annex II;

° by adding a new condition of reciprocity (Article 7(4));

° as to comitology (Article 7). The Council replaced the management committee by a regulatory committee.

81. The first point is a technical provision intended to prevent Mongolia from falling simultaneously within the scope of financial and technical aid under Regulation (EEC) No 443/92 (70) and TACIS assistance. That provision simply enabled Mongolia, which already benefited from assistance programmes, to be maintained in the TACIS programme. (71) Mongolia is included in the beneficiaries of the TACIS programme both in the proposal for a regulation and in the regulation itself. The addition of the new Article 2 in the latter text simply enabled overlapping aid to be avoided. In its opinion of 20 April 1993, the budget committee "... considers it important that Mongolia is among the beneficiaries, in the light of its situation and its need for aid, comparable to that of several independent States, and of that State' s wish to put in place a democratic political system". (72) In paragraph 4 of its explanatory memorandum, the report of the REX committee suggests quite directly that Mongolia should not be able to aggregate the aid to developing countries in Asia under Regulation No 443/92 and that under the TACIS programme. (73)

82. The new Article 2 alters the arrangements for the assistance to Mongolia. It does not affect the substance of the regulation.

83. On the second point, the addition of Annex II did not require a fresh consultation of the Parliament. Annex II lists "in particular" the "indicative" (74) areas which are priority subjects for technical assistance. That list is by way of example and is not exhaustive. It replaces Article 3(3) of the Commission proposal which provided:

> "Technical assistance shall give priority to the fields of human resources development; support for enterprises, including financial services; food production, distribution and marketing; energy and transport".

84. That provision, which is not exhaustive either, excludes none of the areas referred to in Annex II.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

85. Moreover, that annex is practically identical to amendment no 24 creating an Annex Ia, adopted by the Parliament on 27 May 1993. (75)

86. Replacing Article 3(3) of the proposal by Article 4(3) of and Annex II to the regulation amounts to altering the method of defining the material scope of the regulation. Even though Annex II cites by way of example more areas, it does not substantially modify the scope. It is a "change of method rather than of substance", within the meaning of paragraph 23 of the judgment in Buyl and Others v Commission, cited above.

87. On the third point, it will be noted that the introduction of a condition of reciprocity simply reflects settled practice in the matter and conflicts with neither the principles nor the scheme of the TACIS programme.

88. Let me dwell on the much more delicate question of comitology. Article 7 of the Commission proposal provided for a type II(b) (76) management committee: the Commission is to adopt measures which are to apply immediately. If they are not in accordance with the opinion of the committee, the Commission is to defer their application for six weeks, during which period the Council, acting by a qualified majority, may take a different decision which will replace that of the Commission.

89. Article 8 of Regulation No 2053/93 provides for a type III(a) regulatory committee: if the committee gives no opinion or a negative opinion, the Commission is obliged to transform its draft into a proposal to the Council. If the latter takes no decision, the Commission becomes competent again and transforms its proposal into a decision.

90. There is, in my view, a substantial difference between the committee of an advisory nature in Procedure I and the committees provided for by Procedures II and III, since the first excludes any decision-making power of the Council.

91. There is also a substantial difference between committees of type II(a), II(b) and III(a) on the one hand and type III(b) on the other. The latter procedure alone can lead to a deadlock, since the Council can block any decision by simple majority.

92. On the other hand, the type II(a), II(b) and III(a) procedures differ from one another only on minor points, such as time-limits, and by virtue of the fact that, in the latter case, the Council' s decision is taken on the Commission' s proposal, which strengthens the Commission' s position since the Council may depart from that proposal only by acting unanimously. (77) They have in common the fact that in the absence of a decision by the Council, executive power returns to the Commission which is to act.

93. I conclude that there are no differences between the type II(b) management committee and the type III(a) regulatory committee which could be described as substantial amendments of the regulation reaching "... the very heart of the rules enacted...". (78)

94. I accordingly consider that there was no substantial amendment of the Commission' s proposal in the regulation finally adopted.

95. There was no other reason requiring the Parliament to be reconsulted. It is essential to note at this point that the Council' s proposal to introduce a type III committee was known to the Parliament (79) and that the question of comitology was absolutely central to the debates before the Parliament, (80) since several members of the Parliament attributed delays in making finance available and in taking decisions to the existence of a management committee in the 1991-1992 TACIS programme. (81) It was the point of contention between the Council and the Parliament which was ultimately to lead the latter to reject the proposal.

96. The Council representative at the debate was questioned on that issue. (82)

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

97. But at the end of the debate, the Parliament, which was not unaware of the Council' s intentions, chose to reject in toto the proposal for a regulation. Nothing therefore came of the adoption of the amendment providing for an advisory committee proposed by the REX committee.

98. The two first pleas in law must therefore be rejected.

III ° The inherent illegality of Regulation No 2053/93

99. For the Parliament, "... it is quite simply unlawful for an instrument adopted with the mandatory consultation of the Parliament to provide that it may be modified in the course of its application without that formality being respected afresh". (83)

100. The second subparagraph of Article 7(2) of the disputed regulation provides:

> "Services contracts shall, as a general rule, be awarded by restricted invitations to tender and by private treaty for operations up to ECU 300 000. This amount may be revised by the Council on the basis of a Commission proposal, account being taken on experience gained in similar cases."

101. The Parliament submits that respect for its prerogatives requires that it be consulted before such a revision is adopted, since it is a regulation based on Article 235 of the Treaty.

102. There is a certain hierarchy within Community legislation. Basic regulations adopted directly pursuant to procedures laid down by the Treaty must be contrasted with regulations for implementation or execution adopted either by the Commission with the authorization of the Council by virtue of the third indent of Article 155 of the EEC Treaty or by the Council itself by virtue of the third indent of Article 145 thereof. The procedure for the adoption of such regulations is laid down by the basic regulation.

103. The hierarchical relationship between those two categories of instrument means that the implementing regulation may neither modify nor disregard the principles laid down by the basic regulation. The first may not go beyond the bounds of implementing the principles of the second. (84) "The delegated power is... only a power of implementation and not a power of primary application of a Treaty provision". (85)

104. The Court has confirmed the Council' s power of delegation in numerous decisions concerning the common agricultural policy:

> "Both the legislative scheme of the Treaty, reflected in particular by the last indent of Article 155, and the consistent practice of the Community institutions establish a distinction, according to the legal concepts recognized in all the Member States, between the measures directly based on the Treaty itself and derived law intended to ensure their implementation. It cannot therefore be a requirement that all the details of the regulations concerning the common agricultural policy be drawn up by the Council according to the procedure in Article 43. It is sufficient for the purposes of that provision that the basic elements of the matter to be dealt with have been adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down by that provision. On the other hand, the provisions implementing the basic regulations may be adopted according to a procedure different from that in Article 43, either by the Council itself or by the Commission by virtue of an authorization complying with Article 155". (86)

105. The Court has held, in relation to that article, that it follows from the context of the Treaty in which it must be placed and also from practical requirements that the concept of implementation must be given a wide interpretation. (87)

106. The delegation to the Commission of the power to adopt implementing regulations is also common in the field of public contracts. (88)

107. The Single European Act, by amending Article 145 of the Treaty, limited the Council' s

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

power to confer implementing powers on itself:

> "... the Council may reserve the right to exercise implementing powers directly only in specific cases, and it must state in detail the grounds for such a decision". (89)

108. The Parliament is represented neither on the committees which are involved within the Commission (90) nor in certain procedures by which the Council reserves implementing powers, such as that provided for in Article 7 of Regulation No 2053/93. That system is not without logic. While it is normal for the Parliament to be "... consulted each time that a political option is defined, it is also obvious that it has no role where a simple management measure is taken". (91) The ancillary or subordinate character of the implementing procedure justifies less formality in deciding on it. The possibility of delegating is thus one element in the balance of power between the Parliament and the other institutions which may find in it a way of excluding the Parliament from the legislative process. (92) Thus from as early as 1967 (93) the Parliament sought to be consulted on all instruments made pursuant to basic regulations which significantly affect the political, economic or legal effects of those regulations. In a resolution relating to the Community procedures for implementing secondary Community legislation, (94) the Parliament called for a strict limitation of the powers of committees, "bodies not provided for by the Treaty".

109. None the less, by virtue of Article 145 of the Treaty it is unquestionably lawful for the Council to delegate implementing powers to itself even though the procedure for adopting implementing regulations is not governed by the same rules as that concerning the basic regulation.

110. But, specifically, does Article 7 of the regulation at issue concern procedures for implementing or applying the basic regulation or does it affect the fundamental principles underlying that instrument?

111. Is setting the threshold above which service contracts cannot be awarded by restricted invitations to tender or by private treaty a procedure for implementing or applying Regulation No 2053/93?

112. I have two points to make on this.

113. The second subparagraph of Article 7(2) of Regulation No 2053/93 was included in the former Regulation No 2157/91 which provided for the same method of revision of the threshold of 300 000 ECU. (95)

114. In both cases, the procedure for revising the threshold excluding the Parliament did not feature in the Commission proposal and was added by the Council.

115. The power delegated to the Council affects only the procedures for awarding service contracts. Admittedly, the choice of the procedure comprising direct agreement and restricted invitations to tender enables the decision-making progress to be speeded up and the reduction of the threshold below which the Commission may deal by direct agreement makes the system more efficient. However, the second subparagraph of Article 7(2) calls in question neither the principles nor the scheme of the regulation and does not go beyond "implementing powers", (96) which alone may be delegated.

116. The third plea in law must therefore also be rejected.

117. I accordingly conclude that the application should be dismissed in whole.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Tesauro delivered on 23 November 1995.
European Parliament v Council of the European Union.
Common commercial policy - Services - Government procurement.
Case C-360/93.

1 By this action, the European Parliament is seeking the annulment of Council Decision 93/323/EEC concerning the conclusion of an Agreement in the form of a Memorandum of Understanding between the European Economic Community and the United States of America on government procurement (1) and Council Decision 93/324/EEC concerning the extension of the benefit of the provisions of Directive 90/531/EEC in respect of the United States of America, (2) both of 10 May 1993.

The Parliament argues that Article 113 of the EC Treaty alone cannot constitute an appropriate legal basis for the measures in question, which in essence generally extended to US undertakings the benefit of the Community rules governing public procurement, in particular as regards the provision of services. The Parliament takes the view that the two decisions should also have been based on the last sentence of Article 57(2), Article 66 and Article 100a, that is to say, they should have been adopted using the cooperation procedure.

2 The matter therefore turns essentially on whether the common commercial policy includes international trade in services. The Court's Opinions 1/94 on the WTO Agreement (3) and 2/92 on Community participation in the Third Revised Decision of the OECD on national treatment (4) have clarified to a large extent how the concept employed in Article 113 is to be understood, what its scope should be and whether, and to what extent, trade in services is covered. In deciding the case before the Court, it will therefore be necessary to apply the principles set forth in that case-law.

3 For the sake of a proper understanding of the arguments put forward in support of the positions taken up by the parties, it will be necessary briefly to call to mind the purpose and content of the decisions contested by the Parliament.

As part of the progressive establishment of the internal market, the Council adopted on 17 September 1990 Directive 90/531/EEC on the procurement procedure of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (5) (`the exclusive sectors directive'). That directive, as we know, is intended to eliminate restrictions on the free movement of goods and on freedom to provide services in respect of supply contracts awarded in the sectors in question, which, owing to their specific economic features and the special legal regime applying to them in many Member States, had remained outside the scope of preceding liberalization measures.

Pursuant to the principle of Community preference, Article 29(2) of that directive provides that any tender made for the award of a supply contract may be rejected where the proportion of the products originating in third countries exceeds 50% of the total value of the products constituting the tender and Article 29(3) that, in any event, where two or more tenders are equivalent, preference is to be given to the tender of Community origin. Those rules, however, are not applicable to products originating in countries with which the Community has concluded agreements ensuring comparable and effective access for Community undertakings to procurement markets in those countries (Article 29(1)).

Next Article 29(5) and (6) provide that:

`5. For the purposes, in this Article, of determining the proportion referred to in paragraph 2 of products originating in third countries, those third countries to which the benefit of the provisions of this Directive has been extended by a Council Decision in accordance with paragraph 1 shall not be taken into account.

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

6. The Commission shall submit an annual report to the Council (for the first time in the second half of 1991) on progress made in multilateral or bilateral negotiations regarding access for Community undertakings to the markets of third countries in the fields covered by this Directive, on any result which such negotiations may have achieved, and on the implementation in practice of all the agreements which have been concluded.

The Council, acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission, may amend the provisions of this Article in the light of such developments.'

4 Pursuant to the GATT and the commitment given under Article 29 of Directive 90/531/EEC to ensure effective access for Community undertakings to the procurement markets of third countries, the Community concluded an agreement with the United States in 1993 in the form of a Memorandum of Understanding, approved by Council Decision 93/323/EEC, which is challenged in these proceedings. Under Article 1 of that agreement, it is to apply to contracts for goods, works and other services, which are awarded by administrative authorities and other entities governed by public law in the two Contracting Parties, including supplies and works relating to the sector of the production, transportation and distribution of electricity.

Article 2(1) commits the Council to affording to suppliers, contractors and service-providers the award procedures of Directives 77/62/EEC, (6) 92/50/EEC (7) and 71/305/EEC (8) as regards procedures for the award of public contracts whose value exceeds the thresholds indicated in that provision. The United States assumed a similar commitment consisting of applying to European undertakings the provisions of the Buy America Act (Article 2(2)). Article 2(3) excepts derogations from measures liberalizing procurement procedures which were specified by each party at the time when the Multilateral Agreement on Government Procurement of 1979 was concluded in the context of the GATT. (9)

Under Article 3(1), the Community undertakes to extend to US products and undertakings its own legislation on the award of contracts in the sectors covered by Directive 90/531/EEC, with the exclusion of telecommunications - which Article 5 defers for a subsequent specific agreement -, as well as the machinery provided for in order to secure the effective application of that legislation, that is to say, the remedies laid down to that effect by Directive 92/13/EEC. (10) A substantively similar obligation is laid down for the United States (Article 3(2)).

Next, the Community and the United States undertake to carry out a joint study of the economic importance of the public procurement procedures for goods and services covered by the liberalization measures with a view to defining their respective positions in the GATT negotiations on the revision of the 1979 Multilateral Agreement to which I have already adverted (Article 4).

Lastly, Article 7(1) lays down a separate date for the entry into force of the provisions of the Agreement which relate to the procurement of services.

5 It is also worth mentioning that, under Article 7(3), the Agreement is to terminate on 30 May 1995 or upon the entry into force of the new Code on Government Procurement which is being negotiated under the auspices of the GATT. Since, as we know, the Multilateral Agreement on Government Procurement annexed to the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organization (11) will enter into force on 1 January 1996 (Article XXIV), the Community and the United States concluded in May this year a new agreement extending the validity of the previous Memorandum until that date.

Council Decision 95/215/EC approving that agreement (12) is based on the last sentence of Article 57(2) and Articles 66, 100a and 113, precisely the provisions on which, in the Parliament's view, the decisions challenged in these proceedings should have been based. It is worth setting forth in this connection the third and fourth recitals in the preamble to Decision 95/215/EC:

© An extract from a JUSTIS database

`Whereas part of the commitments in the Agreement negotiated by the European Community with the United States on government procurement fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Community under Article 113 of the Treaty;

Whereas, moreover, some of the other commitments affect Community rules adopted on the basis of Articles 57(2), 66 and 100a of the Treaty'.

6 As for the other decision challenged, Decision 93/324/EEC, it sets out to extend the benefit of the provisions of Directive 90/531/EEC to tenders comprising products originating in the United States made for the award of a supply contract in the electric power sector (Article 1) on the ground that, following the agreement concluded with that country, comparable and effective access to government procurement procedures is thus ensured for Community undertakings. In particular, this results in the principle of Community preference laid down by Article 29 of Directive 90/531/EEC being inapplicable to US products. (13)

7 I would first state that it is undisputed that in this case the two conditions are satisfied in order for the Parliament to be entitled to bring an action for annulment before the Court: the action should seek only to safeguard its prerogatives and should be founded only on submissions alleging their infringement. (14)

8 Having said that, I do not consider that the submissions put forward by the parties, in particular as regards Decision 93/324/EEC, in arguing or disputing that the extension of the benefits of Directive 90/531/EEC to traders in third countries constitute an amendment of that directive are of any great use for the purposes of resolving the dispute which gave rise to this case.

In that regard, the Parliament stresses the fact that Decision 93/324/EEC was not adopted in accordance with the ad hoc procedure laid down by Article 29(6) of the directive for the amendment of Article 29 alone, so as to take account of progress made in negotiations designed to secure access for Community undertakings to public procurement markets in third countries. In its view, this shows that the agreement concluded with the United States committed the Community to amending the exclusive sectors directive in its entirety, and such an amendment could have been carried out only pursuant to the same legal bases as the instrument to be amended. In addition, it argues that its claim that the aim of Decision 93/324/EEC was not only to render the principle of Community preference inapplicable to US products is borne out by the fact that Article 1 of the decision refers to all the benefits of Directive 90/531/EEC.

9 For its part, the Council contends that a distinction must be made between amending a Community measure and extending its benefits to subjects other than those initially contemplated. Where, as in the case of Decision 93/324/EEC, the latter hypothesis applies, the measure extending the scope of application of particular rules, in particular to traders in third countries, is normally a separate measure with aims and content different from those of the measure whose benefits it extends. It may therefore quite well have a different legal basis.

The Council acknowledges that the application of that distinction is fraught with considerable difficulties in this case in so far as the provisions of the exclusive sectors directive refer both to possible amendment, for which a derived legal basis is laid down (in Article 29(6)), and to the possible extension of its benefits, for which, since no derived legal basis is laid down, any measures can be based only on the relevant provisions of the Treaty (Article 29(1) and (5)). Having said this, it considers that the answer to the question as to whether Decision 93/324/EEC `amends' or `extends' has no bearing on its validity. Since its aim is essentially to render inapplicable to US products the principle of Community preference laid down by Article 29 of Directive 90/531/EEC, in the event that the decision is considered to be an amendment of the directive, it should be based on the derived legal basis of Article 29(6), whereas if it is construed as extending its benefits, it should be based on Article 113. In both cases, the adoption procedure would be the same: the Council would act by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission.

10 I do not consider that the solution to the dispute turns on accepting one or the other of the two opposing arguments, which, in truth, seem instead to create a species of smokescreen camouflaging the real issue raised by the Parliament's action. The derived legal basis laid down by Article 29(6) was not utilized in order to adopt Decision 93/324/EEC and could not have been so utilized, since it is intended to serve as the basis only for amendments of Article 29 itself: that is manifestly not the aim of the contested decision. Furthermore, a decision by which the Council, acting under Article 29(5), extends the benefits of the exclusive sectors directive to a third country following the conclusion of an agreement which, within the meaning of Article 29(1), ensures in the country concerned comparable and effective access for Community undertakings to public procurement markets, constitutes a separate measure having to be adopted on the basis of the relevant provisions of the Treaty.

11 In the final analysis, the real issue is whether the two decisions could be validly based on Article 113 alone or whether the Community competence should be based (also) on other provisions of the Treaty.

In fact, the very conflict between the different institutions with regard to extending the sphere of application of Article 113 explains the singular game on the part of the parties which characterizes this dispute, which previously emerged in the request for an opinion on the WTO Agreement, to which I have already referred. As we know, the Parliament and the Council, respectively the applicant and the defendant in these proceedings, share the view that it is not possible to bring all international economic relations under the common commercial policy. Whilst that policy should certainly be construed in a broad perspective, Article 113, on this view, cannot constitute the legal basis for the conclusion of international agreements on, for instance, the free movement of services, at least in so far as the services in question are not connected with the supply of goods.

Consequently, the Council seeks to show that recourse to Article 113 alone is justified in this case inasmuch as the main aim of the Memorandum of Understanding concluded with the United States is to render the principle of Community preference laid down in Article 29(2) and (3) inapplicable to tenders comprising US products. In its view, that is the only provision of the exclusive sectors directive underlying the conflict with the US authorities which was sought to be settled. In contrast, the provisions on trade in services contained in that directive are merely ancillary, whilst the reference to all the Community directives on public procurement is designed solely to specify the policy framework within which the Agreement is located.

12 As for the Commission, which has intervened in the proceedings in support of the form of order sought by the Council, it argues that Article 113 is the correct legal basis for the contested decisions, but starts from opposing premises. It argues that the evolution of international trade and the present close connection between trade in goods and trade in services makes it necessary to include services within the ambit of the common commercial policy in order not to impair the Community's ability to act vis-à-vis its trading partners. Since therefore the provisions of the agreement with the United States on the liberalization of access to procurement procedures for services are autonomous in nature, the Commission concludes that its interpretation of Article 113 is consistent with the Court's case-law, which tends to confer a dynamic content on the concept of the common commercial policy.

13 This explains why the Parliament - albeit to a large degree using in support of its position the same arguments as the Commission, in particular in order to confirm the correctness of its interpretation of the content of the contested measures - asks, pursuant to the third paragraph of Article 37 of the Statute of the Court, that the Commission's intervention should be declared inadmissible in so far as it is based on grounds differing from those asserted by the Council. This also explains why the Parliament has not taken a view on the Commission's arguments, considering them unrelated to the object of the application, and merely refers to the inconvenient `conjunction' in that it signed, at the time when the contested decisions were adopted, a joint declaration with the Council, which was annexed to the minutes of the session. In that declaration, the two institutions agreed, first, that the parts of the memorandum concluded with the United States relating to services and public works were ancillary and, secondly, that recourse to Article 113 was without prejudice to their respective positions as to the possibility of utilizing that provision in future as the legal basis for the conclusion of agreements on trade in services.

14 The objection of inadmissibility raised by the Parliament should be rejected. Whilst there is no doubt that the arguments put forward by the Commission to the effect that the contested decisions were lawfully adopted on the basis of Article 113 alone are different to or actually at odds with the defendant's, it cannot be denied that the form of order sought by the Commission in its statement in intervention are `limited to supporting the submissions of one of the parties', as is required by Article 37 of the Statute of the Court. It does not seem to me to be relevant to refer in this connection to the precedent of Case C-155/91 Commission v Council: (15) in that case, the Parliament's intervention was declared inadmissible only in so far as it sought an alternative form of order with respect to the claims of the applicant which it was supporting. This is clearly not the case.

15 Turning to the merits, in the first place I consider it to be hard to argue that Article 113 constitutes the correct legal basis for the agreement in question in as much as its `main aim' is claimed to be to render inapplicable the principle of Community preference to US products comprising a tender in a public procurement procedure. In this connection, it is worth recalling that, as the Court has held on several occasions, (16) the choice of the legal basis for a measure may not depend simply on an institution's conviction as to the objective pursued but must be based on objective factors which are amenable to judicial review. The aim and content of the measure are particularly relevant in this connection.

16 The preamble to the Memorandum of Understanding concluded between the Community and the United States (17) makes it clear that it aims, in the light of the commitments already entered into by the parties in the context of the abovementioned GATT Multilateral Agreement on Government Procurement and of the further progress made in the negotiations, to anticipate, bilaterally and on a reciprocal basis, further steps on the road towards achieving the objective of eliminating every form of discrimination between domestic and foreign products and suppliers.

To that end, Article 1 opens the Contracting Parties' public procurement markets in a way which is no longer limited to the mere acquisition of products and any services ancillary to their supply, as was laid down by the 1979 Agreement - which for that very reason was concluded on the basis of Article 113 only, without this having given risen to particular difficulties. In contrast, the commitment to ensuring the other party's undertakings access to public contracts on the same terms as one's own undertakings - subject to the derogations mentioned at the beginning of these observations - is also extended to the performance of public works and the supply of services.

17 As a result of the reference made by Article 2(1) to the provisions of the directives on public works and services and as the annexes to the Memorandum make clear, (18) the measures for the liberalization of procurement relate to the performance and design of buildings and civil engineering works, computer, accounting and advertising services, a number of financial services and so on, where their value exceeds the thresholds laid down.

Consequently, the provisions on services have a measure of independence within the context of the agreement and it is impossible to assert the (purely economic and, moreover, unproven) argument, so as to reduce the scope of the commitments undertaken by the Community, that, in view of the nature of the activities covered by the liberalization measures, it would be difficult to imagine US undertakings making tenders in response to an invitation to tender or a tender notice unless they were established in the Community. If they were, freedom to provide services would be already guaranteed to them by the Community directives, which apply irrespective of the origin of the capital of companies incorporated under the law of one of the Member States.

18 Since it is therefore clear that the agreement at issue is also aimed at the provision of services - where, of course, the provision is based on a public contract - it follows that it could not properly have been concluded on the basis of Article 113 alone; for the same reasons, neither was Decision 93/324/EEC, which, following that agreement, extends to US undertakings the benefit of the exclusive sectors directive, entitled to have been based on that legal basis alone.

Lastly, what the Court stated in Opinion 1/94 should be called to mind: only cross-frontier services may be brought within the concept of the common commercial policy. Whilst the situation in which the service is rendered by a supplier in one country to a consumer residing in another is not unlike trade in goods, the same cannot be said of other modes of supply of services. In particular, the provision of services by a service-provider from one country by virtue of his having a commercial presence on the territory of another country or through the presence of natural persons is different. (19)

Moreover, it was also explained in Opinion 1/94 that `it is clear from Article 3 of the Treaty, which distinguishes between "a common commercial policy" in paragraph (b) and "measures concerning the entry and movement of persons" in paragraph (d), that the treatment of nationals of non-member countries on crossing the external frontiers of Member States cannot be regarded as falling within the common commercial policy. More generally, the existence in the Treaty of specific chapters on the free movement of natural and legal persons shows that those matters do not fall within the common commercial policy.' (20)

19 It is clear that the modes of provision of services to which the agreement concluded between the Community and the United States on procurement refers (I would merely mention the case of the performance of civil engineering works) certainly cannot be classed as cross-frontier provision of services. It follows that the Parliament's application must be upheld.

20 The Council has requested that, in the event that the Court should decide to annul the contested decisions, it should conserve the effects which they have already had, by applying the principles laid down in the judgment in the `right of residence' case. (21)

In that case, the possibility afforded by Article 174 of the Treaty to limit the effects of a judgment declaring a regulation void was extended to the case of the annulment of a directive. In that regard, the Court essentially considered that, since Article 174 is an expression of the more general principle of legal certainty, it must be able to be applied beyond the cases which it expressly contemplates.

It seems to me that reasons of legal certainty justify accepting the Council's request. In view of the fact that certain undertakings may already have exercised the rights conferred on them pursuant to the contested agreement and the decisions implementing it, that the agreement expired in any event on 30 May 1995 and that the Parliament has not opposed the Council's request, I consider that the effects produced to date by the two decisions should not be called in question.

21 In the light of the foregoing observations, I therefore propose that the Court should:

- annul Council Decision 93/323/EEC of 10 May 1993 concerning the conclusion of an Agreement in the form of a Memorandum of Understanding between the European Economic Community and the United States of America on government procurement and Council Decision 93/324/EEC of 10 May 1993 concerning the extension of the benefit of the provisions of Directive 90/531/EEC in respect of the United States of America;

- preserve the effects of the decisions in question;

- order the Council to pay the costs, saving those of the Commission, which should bear its own costs.

Opinion of Mr Advocate General Tesauro delivered on 17 November 1994.
Commission of the European Communities v Kingdom of the Netherlands.
Tender notices for public supply contracts - Review procedure - Notification - Technical specifications.
Case C-359/93.

Mr President,

Members of the Court,

1. In this action the Commission seeks a declaration that the Kingdom of the Netherlands has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts, (1) as subsequently amended by Directives 80/767/EEC of 22 July 1980 (2) and 88/295/EEC of 22 March 1988, (3) and also under Article 30 of the Treaty.

To be more specific, the Commission considers that the tender notice for a public supply contract published by the Nederlands Inkoopcentrum NV (hereinafter "the NIC") in the Official Journal of the European Communities of 10 December 1991 concerning the supply and maintenance of a meteorological station (4) does not comply with Community requirements. The Commission relies on two grounds: failure to indicate the persons authorized to be present at the opening of tenders as well as the date, time and place of opening; and inclusion in the general terms and conditions of a technical specification defined by reference to a product of a specific make, namely the UNIX data-processing system developed by Bell Laboratories of ITT, without mentioning that it is open to the supplier to use an equivalent system.

It should be borne in mind that the Commission gave the Netherlands and the contracting authority notice of those criticisms, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 3(1) and (2) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts. (5) The Commission stated that notification was to be treated as formal notice for the purposes of Article 169 of the Treaty and that the subsequent communication from the Netherlands Government would be treated as the observations provided for in that article.

2. It would be helpful to recall the relevant provisions of the directive in question in order to arrive at a proper understanding of the allegations made against the defendant and of the latter' s arguments.

Article 9(5) of the directive requires the contracting authorities to draw up the notices in accordance with the models set out in Annex III. If the contract is to be awarded by "open" procedure, as it was in the case under consideration, the notice must contain, in particular, the following information (Point 7 of the Annex):

> "(a) Persons authorized to be present at the opening of tenders"

and

> "(b) the date, time and place of this opening."

Article 7(6), added to Title II of that directive, provides that:
